The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph, lines 9 to 17, both inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, before that is voted on I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Then, I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] a question. I would like to know whether or not he knows that the contracts for the changes here have been already made?

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts answered that question a moment ago and to say that they had not.

Mr. McCALL. They have not.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will say but very little on this subject.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] to allow me to ask him one question.

Mr. KEIFER. If it is not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. As an expert, you having been Speaker of this House, I want to ask if it is not possible to avoid that change and that expense by the Speaker's requiring each Member to remain at his desk while he is in the House, and to preserve order?

Mr. KEIFER. That needs no expert to answer. If every gentleman would remain in his seat and preserve order, we would always have order, and we could be well heard anywhere in this Hall.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is not the question, if the gentleman will pardon me. I asked if it is not possible for the Speaker to compel them so that we can have the benefit of the Hall to do business?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not believe this body of men, composed as it is of gentlemen desirous, as they are, of always preserving their good behavior, can be kept in that situation by any Speaker in the world.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then you have lost my vote. I was going to vote with you.

Mr. KEIFER. You will have to vote on other grounds. I have high respect for you, but I think sometime or other you would violate the rule you would like the Speaker to enforce, notwithstanding the Speaker might try to have you obey a good rule.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I might suggest that the gentleman ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. KEIFER. I did not care to get into this colloquy. I have seen efforts made by different Speakers to keep this Hall in good order, and I think gentlemen believe they are doing their duty sometimes even when they talk too loud and keep out of their seats and get down in front of the desk. At times they can be required to keep their seats, but they will not keep them constantly.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the proposition to change this Hall, which has grown sacred in its use for so many years, is going to be a successful one. I understand perfectly that it is a box with halls around it, and no sunlight directly coming into it except that which is strained in through the colored glass over us, and we hardly ever get any pure air here except that which is pumped in by some process or other; and yet I understand that when the new plan is carried out we are to have that same condition, only a little exaggerated from what it is now.

This Hall is not an easy one for persons to be heard in. Unless the Members keep the order that my friend would like to have, it is not an easy one. But the proposition to change it and to alter it is not one that commends itself, I think, to anybody who has given any attention to it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEIFER. An enlargement of the Hall will not help the accoustics of the Hall. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I agree with the gentleman, and I want to ask but one question. I want to ask him if he does not think we ought to be rather reluctant now, in the present condition of the Treasury, to spend $350,000 for our own convenience and simply to beautify and improve this Chamber, where for a number of years we have assembled satisfactorily, and to which we are all anxious to come back? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes. I did not have the last minute. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his time five minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEIFER. I thank the House. We have heard a great deal about spending the people's money, and the gentleman may be right in his opinion that this experiment of undertaking to make a better Hall and provide better conveniences here by the expenditure right now of $350,000 just as the Democratic majority—pretended, at least—is coming into power, and to make all these improvements for their convenience in the Hall, is an experiment of doubtful propriety. It may be that that is a good argument against making the change. I was recently in the hall of the popular legislative body in Brussels, Belgium. It is differently constructed from this one. It is not so large, and it has not so great a floor space as this, and the desks are much smaller and have many conveniences which our desks lack. I think if our desks here were modeled on those we would not have so much room here for trash and truck about us that are always in our way, but we would have room enough to write letters if we wanted to, and to keep some papers conveniently near us for examination and for use in case we made speeches.

I was particular in looking at the models of desks in that legislative chamber and their arrangement, and with those arrangements, if they were installed here and these cumbersome desks taken out, I am sure we can provide for that monstrous House that is to meet here, not in the Sixty-second Congress but in the Sixty-third Congress, and that the 433 or more Members of it can well be provided for and have as much comfort and convenience, at least, as we have here now.

So I make my motion, although I am not interested personally in the result of it. I make the motion to strike out the clause, not that I am objecting at all to the names of the persons who are to have charge of this matter of altering or changing this Hall, in case it is to be changed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, just a moment——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I always listen to the gentleman from Ohio with great respect, but I think that he is wrong in this instance. The House of Representatives in the last Congress, after the question had been discussed, voted to authorize this change without a division. This Chamber is by far the largest chamber that any legislative body in the world has, and one reason, it seems to me, why this House of Representatives is not regarded outside of it as the greatest legislative body in the world is because it is trying to do business in the greatest legislative chamber of the world. The floor area of this House is nearly three times that of the British House of Commons. If we want to see ourselves as others see us, we have only to look at the estimates made of this House by writers of authority who have looked upon it from the galleries. We all know that the case is an exceptional one when we go to the gallery with a friend and that friend is able to hear anything that is being said in debate.

This hall has been written about by writers of authority. The leading one, perhaps, is Mr. James Bryce, now the ambassador of Great Britain in this country, and he says:

> It is more than thrice as large as the English House of Commons, with a floor about equal in area to that of Westminster Hall, 139 feet long by 93 feet wide and 36 feet high. * * * The proportions are so good that it is not till you observe how small a man looks at the farther end, and how faint ordinary voices sound, that you realize its vast size. * * *
> When you enter, your first impression is of noise and turmoil, a noise like that of short, sharp waves in a Highland loch fretting under a squall against a rocky shore. The raising and dropping of desk lids, the scratching of pens, the clapping of hands to call the pages—keen little boys who race along the gangways—the pattering of many feet, the hum of talking on the floor and in the galleries, make up a din over which the Speaker with the sharp taps of his hammer, or the orators straining shrill throats, find it hard to make themselves audible. I never heard American voices sound so harsh or disagreeable as they do here. Nor is it only the noise that gives the impression of disorder. Often three or four members are on their feet at once, each shouting to catch the Speaker's attention. * * * Less favorable conditions for oratory can not be imagined, and one is not surprised to be told that debate was more animated and practical in the much smaller room which the House formerly occupied.

And then we have the same thing from a high American authority, President Woodrow Wilson, now governor of New Jersey, in which he expresses himself very emphatically in criticism of the House of Representatives, the great popular body of the American people, attempting to transact its business in a hall of such enormous size as this.

Only recently in one of the magazines Prof. Goldwin Smith, who before his death came to be the first man of letters of the British Empire and who was a warm friend of our country and our institutions, gave an estimate of this House as seen from the gallery, and it comported closely with that given by Mr. Bryce and Mr. Wilson. Now, Mr. Chairman, this House has not attracted the attention that it should have received, not because its Members have lacked in ability, because the greatest men who ever served in the Senate have also served in the House of Representatives. Henry Clay made some of his greatest speeches in yonder Hall; Daniel Webster was also an ornament of the House, and John Quincy Adams, as we all know, made almost his greatest record as a representative of the people. We have had very many great men here who were never in the Senate. We have had Presidents like Lincoln, Garfield, and McKinley, and we have had other eminent statesmen, orators, like Henry Winter Davis, Thomas B. Reed, and Speaker Crisp who were not in the other House.

But it is admitted, I believe, by those who have studied the House of Representatives that debate in this body does not have the practical effect and the influence that it had when the House was in a smaller chamber.

In the revised plans that have been prepared with very great care the commission has not been hasty in reaching a decision. We do remedy the defect spoken of by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER]; we carry the House through to the outer air on the south side of the Chamber. We reduce the floor area of the Hall by over 2,200 feet, and we reduce its cubical contents by about 140,000 cubic feet, so that in contents it is but little larger than the Senate Chamber. I believe that the one thing that is indispensable to give this House the place that belongs to it under our Constitution, to secure its efficiency and to put it where historians will recognize its merit, is to adopt the pending proposition and make the appropriation that has already been authorized by law. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I can not help speaking a word on this matter.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman a moment? I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and the motion of the gentleman be closed in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that all debate be closed in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. NYE. I object.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield for that purpose?

Mr. PARKER. I yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to talk of this as a practical matter. We may all agree, and do all agree, that we would rather speak in a smaller hall. That can be tried. A partition on either side of the Speaker's desk from north to south, with galleries east and west, would give large rooms under the galleries for the gathering of Members on either side, Democratic and Republican.

I can not agree that it is well to carry this hall clear back to the windows of the south wall. That will not help ventilation. The windows are there now, which would ventilate if people would let them be open. They are now in a lobby, and if in the Hall of Congress there would be still more objection to our opening any of those windows. I can not agree that ventilation is now impossible. Air is like a rope—more easily pulled than pushed. We have been following the plan of pushing in hot air and letting it out at the top. The hot air that comes in goes up in a column to the top and leaves the foul air here.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does not the gentleman think that we generate a great deal of hot air. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, that is not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. McCALL. We ventilate both above and below.

Mr. PARKER. We do not draw the air from where it is fouled, at the height of a man's head, so as to clear the hall of that foul stratum of air. Mr. Chairman, a single fireplace fixed in the wall up to the height of 8 feet from the ground would give more ventilation than anything that we have here.

I want to say besides that that room in the rear is absolutely essential. We go around this House from one side to the other by passing through that lobby. Take it away and you will find you have absolutely lost any power of going from one side of the House to the other without going out in another direction. It is our best room for consultation. That is so in the Senate Chamber, where it is the marble room. It is necessary here.

I maintain we ought not to try to make such great changes. It is easy to put benches in the center of this Hall and a partition on either side, giving to each party in the House plenty of room for a lobby and reading room, with books, facilities for writing, lockers for each Member's papers, opportunity for consultation, and giving aid to the House for independent action, which does not exist now. This is the best plan. If we insist on separate desks, we could roof that room, make a gallery incline, with desks enough for the Members in those galleries, leaving a pit in which the speaking could be done. There are plenty of ways to accommodate the House, but this particular plan is not complete. It takes away the desks and does not provide adjoining rooms where writing can be done. And it is premature. The act providing for 430 Members is not yet a law, and it is not likely to pass, from the looks of things at present, at least at this session. This new plan leaves the Cherokee Strip and puts part of the House so far on each side that they are really behind the Speaker. It perpetuates the folly of binding each Member to one seat instead of leaving him free to sit where it may be convenient as business proceeds. It is an incomplete plan. The matter can properly be put over until further consideration is given to alternative plans. I therefore favor the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio that this paragraph should be struck out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KEIFER) there were—ayes 44, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Printing Investigation Commission: The authority vested in the Printing Investigation Commission to examine into the general subject of the public printing and binding of Congress and the various executive departments, as now existing under authority of an act making appropriations to supply deficiencies, approved March 4, 1909, is hereby continued during the term of the Sixty-second Congress; and the said commission shall consist of three Senators who are members of the Joint Committee on Printing and three Members of the House elected to the Sixty-second Congress, to be appointed by the Speaker, and the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated, to continue available until July 1, 1912, for the expenses of said Printing Investigation Commission.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> After the word "appropriated," in line 6, on page 212, insert "to be immediately available and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 212, line 5, insert after "Speaker" "and to serve until the convening of the Sixty-second Congress."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the effect of that amendment is simply to cover over the recess.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE—PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

Office of the Public Printer: Public Printer, $5,500; purchasing agent, $3,600; attorney, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,500; accountant, $2,500; assistant purchasing agent, $2,500; cashier and paymaster, $2,500; clerk in charge of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the Capitol, $2,500; assistant accountant, $2,250; chief timekeeper, $2,000; 1 clerk, $2,000; paying teller, $2,000; telegrapher and clerk, $1,800; 10 clerks of class four; 11 clerks of class three; 6 clerks of class two; 6 clerks of class one; 9 clerks, at $1,000 each; 4 clerks, at $900 each; 6 clerks, at $840 each; 12 clerks, at $720 each; paymaster's guard, $1,000; chief doorkeeper, $1,200; doorkeeper, $1,200; 6 assistant doorkeepers, at $1,000 each; 2 messengers, at $840 each; chief delivery man, $1,200; 5 delivery men, at $950 each; tenephone switchboard operator, $720; 3 assistant telephone switchboard operators, at $600 each; 5 messenger boys, at $450 each; in all, $133,780.

Office of the Deputy Public Printer: Deputy Public Printer, $4,500; inspector of paper and material, as provided for in section 20 of an act to provide for the public printing and binding, approved January 12, 1895, $2,000; 2 clerks of class one; 1 clerk, $900; 1 chemist, $1,600; 1 messenger, $840; 1 messenger boy, $420; in all, $12,660.

Watch force: Captain of the watch, $1,200; 2 lieutenants of the watch, at $900 each; and 64 day and night watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $49,080.

Holidays: To enable the Public Printer to comply with the provisions of the law granting holidays and the Executive order granting half holidays with pay to the employees of the Government Printing Office, $180,000.

Leaves of absence: To enable the Public Printer to comply with the provisions of the law granting 30 days' annual leave to the employees of the Government Printing Office, $340,000.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the words "chief clerk, $2,500," line 15, page 212.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Missouri insists upon the point of order we will have to reinsert the language of the present law which makes this man private secretary to the Public Printer. We intended to give him something to do by making him chief clerk instead of private secretary to the head of the organization.

Mr. MURPHY. If the gentleman will put in the salary fixed by law, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. The salary is not changed at all.

Mr. MURPHY. The salary is $2,250 by law, and you have made it $2,500 only for the year in the last appropriation bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. We give him the salary we are giving him now.

Mr. MURPHY. But the law fixes the salary at $2,250.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no law fixing the salary, except in the current appropriation law he appears as secretary to the Public Printer, $2,500; and the committee thought, and the Public Printer recommended, that it had better be changed so that he might be assigned to duty as chief clerk, instead of serving as secretary to a single officer.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if this stands as it is if it would affect the office of the Deputy Public Printer?

Mr. TAWNEY. In no way. The duties of the Deputy Public Printer are defined by law. There is not a single duty that the Deputy Public Printer performs to-day that he will not be required and have an opportunity of performing after this provision becomes a law.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman is in error as to that.

Mr. TAWNEY. I know there is an attorney in the Government office who thinks that the effect of this appropriation in the appropriation bill will be to change the law with respect to the duties of the Deputy Public Printer as defined by law.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. In section 36 of the general printing law of 1895 the chief clerk therein designated is the man to act as Public Printer in case of death, resignation, and so forth.

Mr. TAWNEY. But a subsequent law changed——

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. That is the law of May 27, 1908, but is it not a fact now that if you change the title of secretary back to chief clerk, it will have the effect of wiping out the functions of the Deputy Public Printer?

Mr. TAWNEY. It will have no effect whatever, except to enable the Public Printer to impose upon this officer the performance of duties that he can not now perform as private secretary. That is the only effect.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I think you will relieve the Deputy Public Printer of any duties at all, except what the Public Printer may assign to him. As the law stands it looks as if you re-create the office of chief clerk, which was prior to the act of 1908, and practically wipe out the office of Deputy Public Printer.

Mr. TAWNEY. We do not affect the office or duties of the Deputy Public Printer by this change, and it is not contemplated by anyone, either the Public Printer or any member of the committee who recommends this change. This is simply for the purpose of enabling the Public Printer to assign to this man duties which he otherwise could not do.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the same man who is now private secretary be the chief clerk?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Do I understand the chief clerk takes the place of the Deputy Public Printer?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Where do you provide for the Deputy Public Printer in here?

Mr. TAWNEY. In the following paragraph. The next paragraph provides for the Deputy Public Printer.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman in charge of the bill a question. Is there any law now authorizing this attorney at $3,000?

Mr. TAWNEY. Nothing except the existing or current appropriation act.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want to make a point of order on that.

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota one other question. Will the gentleman who is secretary now to the Public Printer be made chief clerk?

Mr. TAWNEY. That I can not answer. I have no control over the personnel of the office. I do not think the Public Printer contemplates changing the personnel in his office at all under this provision. Of course he could do it anyhow, if he wanted to.

Mr. MURPHY. The private secretary is now under the civil service. Would this chief clerk be under the civil service?

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman is misinformed. The private secretary is not under the civil service.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; I beg the gentleman's pardon, but Mr. Roosevelt covered him into the civil service. He is a Missourian, and we have been looking after him.

Mr. TAWNEY. The rules of the Civil Service Commission expressly authorize the appointment of private secretaries by the head of any bureau or head of department or other Government establishment. But the chief clerk has to be appointed under the civil-service rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, if the point of order is insisted upon, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want to make a point of order, Mr. Chairman, on line 14, page 12, "attorney, $3,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order against the language, "attorney, $3,000."

The Chair will ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether there is any authorization for this?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no statutory authorization, except in the appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I reserved a point of order on the paragraph for the purpose of including this attorney. He has gone out now on the point of order, and I withdraw the point of order on the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the public printing, for the public binding, and for paper for the public printing and binding, including the cost of printing the debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and for lithographing, mapping, and engraving for both Houses of Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the Court of Claims, the Library of Congress, the Smithsonian Institution, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the International Bureau of American Republics, the Executive Office, and the departments; for salaries, compensation, or wages, of all necessary employees additional to those herein specifically appropriated for, including the compensation of the foreman of binding and the foreman of printing; rents, fuel, gas, electric current, gas and electric fixtures, and ice; bicycles, horses, wagons and harness, electrical vehicles, and the care, driving, and subsistence of the same, to be used only for official purposes, including the purchase, maintenance, and driving of horses and vehicles for official use of the officers of the Government Printing Office when in writing ordered by the Public Printer; freight, expressage, telegraph and telephone service; furniture, typewriters, and carpets; traveling expenses, stationery, postage, and advertising; directories, technical books, and books of reference, not exceeding $500; adding and numbering machines, time stamps, and other machines of similar character; machinery (not exceeding $100,000); equipment, and for repairs to machinery, implements, and buildings, and for minor alterations to buildings; construction of roof over vacant walled space west of the H Street Annex to the Government Printing Office; necessary equipment, maintenance, and supplies for the emergency room for the use of all employees in the Government Printing Office who may be taken suddenly ill or receive injury while on duty; other necessary contingent and miscellaneous items authorized by the Public Printer; and for all the necessary materials and equipment needed in the prosecution and delivery of the work, $4,581,230.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order upon the two words "electrical vehicles," in line 9, page 215. It seems to be new.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that is one of the means of equipment of this establishment.

Mr. MACON. I understand it is, and so would automobiles be, and so would a street car be, or anything else that the gentleman might appropriate for in this paragraph.

Mr. KEIFER. Then your point is you would not have it equipped at all?

Mr. MACON. Oh, yes; but I am against an equipment of that kind.

Mr. KEIFER. That is as much equipment as bicycles and wagons.

Mr. MACON. Oh, you might appropriate for an automobile for the Speaker or an automobile for each Member of the House on an appropriation bill if bills of that kind can carry an appropriation for electrical vehicles for the Public Printer.

Mr. KEIFER. This is an automobile such as we have been providing for you in the future.

Mr. MACON. I fought against that, sir; and tried to get it out on a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the gentleman referring to electrical vehicles at the Printing Office?

Mr. MACON. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Public Printer explained to the committee that by utilizing the space he has there and by roofing it over and substituting motor-propelled vehicles for horses and wagons he could make a very substantial reduction in the cost of transportation in the office.

Mr. MACON. I am advised it would cost $75,000 to $100,000 to make the changes provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. The Public Printer can utilize the vacant space by roofing it over and using it as a stable.

Mr. MACON. The electrical vehicles can be used for any purpose for the Public Printer to ride in in this city, Maryland, or Virginia, or wherever else he sees fit to go.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. MACON. You ought to show what the purpose is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no desire to furnish the Public Printer with an automobile——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] if he can inform the Chair whether the Public Printing Office now has means of transportation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Public Printer has horses and wagons for the purpose of transporting materials to be utilized by the Public Printer in the conduct of his office. I am not certain whether he has one electrical vehicle or not.

Mr. COX of Indiana. It is not carried in the language of the last bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not certain about it. I am not certain whether the Public Printer has any motor vehicles or not. I will ask the chairman of the committee if he has.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; they have none. The purpose is to substitute the motor vehicles; that is, to replace the hauling vehicles with electrical trucks, and by adopting this provision the Public Printer will be able to abolish or abandon the stable entirely and save all the expense incident to the maintenance of the stable for the horses that they are now using for the transportation of freight, and utilize another building for the mechanical equipment necessary to maintain the automobile. The saving to the Government is $12,000 a year in rent.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Under the language in the bill here, "electrical vehicles," it will be possible, will it not, to absolutely supplant the present means of transportation and substitute therefor electrical vehicles?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Then I shall object to it. What is the present equipment worth?

Mr. TAWNEY. A saving of approximately $12,000 a year will result. We asked the Public Printer:

Mr. SMITH. Where will the saving come in?

Mr. DONNELLY. First, in the item of rent. We are now paying $2,400 a year for a stable.

Mr. SMITH. Do you propose to substitute all electrical vehicles?

Mr. DONNELLY. Yes, sir; here is a statement [exhibiting]. The expense of operating the stable at the present time is $31,113.58 per annum.

Mr. COX of Indiana. How much is that?

Mr. TAWNEY. $31,000. Then he proceeds:

The cost of operation, maintenance, and repair of electrical vehicles would amount to $21,917.50.

Mr. MALBY. What does the $31,000 represent?

Mr. DONNELLY. It is made up of these items: Wages of foreman and stablemen, $10,113.59; wages of drivers, $12,666.21——

Mr. MALBY (interposing). Does it represent the purchase of horses, for instance?

Mr. DONNELLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. How much would it cost, in addition to the $8,000, to equip the Government Printing Office with these electrical vehicles in lieu of the others?

Mr. DONNELLY. It will cost $30,000.

Mr. MALBY. Could you get more service out of the electrical vehicles?

Mr. DONNELLY. Much more service and more efficient service. Our stable is, for a heavy truck team, about 10 minutes from the Government Printing Office, going and coming. This lot is 100 yards from our shipping and receiving platforms.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What is the present outfit worth—the horses, harness, and so forth?

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me read a little further:

Mr. SMITH. What size electrical vehicles are you expecting to use, trucks?

Mr. DONNELLY. One 4-ton truck, three 3-ton trucks, three 1-ton trucks, 2 mail wagons, and 3 light electrical vehicles for delivery and conveyance purposes.

Mr. SMITH. What do you say as to whether you would immediately have to raise the salary of the chauffeurs above the salary of the drivers, whether or not a higher-priced man is not necessary to operate an electrical vehicle than to drive a team in Washington?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I ask that the gentleman may be accorded five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks that the gentleman from Minnesota may have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. To that question the Public Printer answered:

No, sir; we would instruct the present force of drivers to operate the machines.

Now, anyone familiar with the operation of electric-motor vehicles knows that it requires less skill to operate an electric-motor vehicle than it does to operate a gasoline or power motor.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If the Public Printer shall substitute the electrical vehicles for the horses and wagons that he now has, has he any information as to what the present value of the horses and wagons is which would be dispensed with by the use of electrical vehicles?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have not, Mr. Chairman, except by inference, from the amount that is expended annually on the purchase of horses.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Let me ask the gentleman this question: If it be the purpose to dispense with the horses and wagons——

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; to substitute electric vehicles entirely for horses and wagons.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If the gentleman will wait until I put the question to him, I would be glad. If it is the purpose to dispense with the horses and wagons and substitute electric vehicles, then what was the necessity of carrying in this bill the old vehicles, horses, wagons, harness, and so forth? In other words, if we are going to dispense with the old equipment and use the electric vehicles alone, why did the gentleman carry the other equipment along in the bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the Public Printer can not change from one kind of transportation to another in an instant, or in a day or a month. It can not be done instantly. It will have to be done gradually.

Mr. COX of Indiana. This appropriation does not become effective until July next?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not until July 1.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The change in the building could not be made until that time.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Public Printer can then prepare for the change. The expenditure, however, for horses and wagons will not be made. The expenditure for electrical apparatus or vehicles will be made after the 1st of July. But provision must be made for the maintenance of the horses until the substitution is made.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Under this language it is broad enough to buy electrical motors for the superintendent to ride around in.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not. The Public Printer himself states the number of machines that he intends to purchase with this appropriation and the character of them, and there are none of them for his own personal use.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas insist on the point of order?

Mr. MACON. Yes; I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. MACON. I desire to have a word in reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to have a word. The Chair desires to inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota whether the Public Printing Office now maintains any system of transportation.

Mr. TAWNEY. The means of transportation is authorized. The law establishing the Government Printing Office clothes the Government Printer, the head of the department, with the authority to do the public printing and necessarily includes the authority for the equipment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked the gentleman whether, as a matter of fact, the Government Printing Office is now maintaining a system of transportation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, certainly; I did not understand the inquiry of the Chair.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, a few years ago the President of the United States was not furnished with automobiles, and when it was desired to change his transportation by horses and vehicles to automobiles it was necessary to provide for them in an orderly way and not upon an appropriation bill.

In this particular instance, they have a system of transportation in connection with the Public Printing Bureau, but it is with horses, wagons, and so forth, and they still provide in this paragraph for the continuation of the horses, wagons, and harness for transportation facilities. In addition to that, they bring in new matter and try to authorize an entirely new system of transportation, to wit, that of electrical machines. So that under this paragraph, if it is held to be in order, the Public Printer can provide himself with an electric carriage or any other kind of an electrical vehicle that he saw fit to use, and in doing so would be given a privilege that is in direct violation of the rules of this House when it prohibits new matter being carried upon an appropriation bill. I do not think it will do to say that because some department in the city of Washington is now furnished with horses and carriages—the Secretary of War, for instance, or the Secretary of the Navy, who are provided with horses and carriages—that upon an appropriation bill it could be provided that that character of transportation could be dispensed with, and a $20,000 automobile substituted therefor. It is my contention that this is new matter on this appropriation bill and not authorized under existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Public Printing Office is maintained in accordance with law, and in the course of its business, as the Chair understands it, is required constantly to transport paper and other supplies and printed matter from one part of the city to another and to and from the Printing Office and to the various departments. The gentleman from Arkansas is quite correct in stating that in an appropriation bill it would not be in order to provide automobile transportation for some official of the Government without authority of law, but in this case there exists the authority and the necessity for providing transportation for the Public Printing Office in order that it may conduct the business for which it is organized.

The bill and the law carries other forms of transportation—bicycles, horses, wagons, and so forth, to be used only for official purposes. This paragraph includes the additional form of transportation by electrical vehicles. The Chair thinks the Government Printing Office, under the law, is entitled to transport its products and the articles from which it manufactures its products. And it seems to the Chair that the item is entirely different from those items where it is sought to provide for a particular kind of transportation for a particular official for his personal or official use. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 6, after the word "dollars," insert:
"Provided, That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of pressmen employed in the Government Printing Office shall be at the rate of not less than 55 cents per hour."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the associated printing trades in great cities like Chicago are paying men from 60 to 65 and 70 cents an hour, and the Government of the United States is paying only 50 cents an hour. I think the United States can pay 55 cents an hour without jeopardizing the rights of the people. These men are all experienced men, men trained in the art of printing, and 55 cents an hour is as little as is paid in any of the trades throughout the country. This certainly is not an exorbitant sum, and I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. FORNES. Are the printers in the private printing offices throughout the country given work the year round as in the Public Printing Office?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course there is no certainty about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota insist upon the point of order?

Mr. TAWNEY. I shall insist on the point of order, but I want to say, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that I do not do so simply because this is a change of existing law, but because the men who are employed in the Government Printing Office enjoy privileges and receive compensation that men employed in the regular commercial printing offices do not receive. For example, these men receive 30 days' leave of absence, with pay. They receive pay for all of the holidays; and if members of the committee will take the trouble to read the paragraph on page 214 of the bill, they will find there is $180,000 appropriated for compensation on account of holidays. Then, we also carry an appropriation for leaves of absence that aggregate $340,000. All of that is distributed among the employees of the Government Printing Office, which the employees in commercial establishments do not receive. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I submit herewith, to be printed in the RECORD for the information of the House, the second conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill and the statement accompanying it:

SECOND CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 29360) "making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 30, 31, 32, 33, 200, 201, and 218.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 85, 86, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 202, and 205 and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$90,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 42: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 44: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$7,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 45: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$71,820"; and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 99, 100, 101, and 102 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 29360) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1912, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying report as to each of said amendments, as follows:

On amendments Nos. 30, 31, 32, and 33: Strikes out the proposed increase in the salaries of the official reporters and stenographers to committees of the House.

On amendments Nos. 41 and 42: Appropriates $90,000, instead of $100,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $75,000, as proposed by the House, for the increase of the Library of Congress.

On amendments Nos. 44 and 45: Appropriates $7,500, instead of $10,000, as proposed by the Senate and $6,000, as proposed by the House, for the salary of the Secretary to the President.

On amendments Nos. 85 and 86: Appropriates $6,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $5,500, as proposed by the House, for the salary of the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

On amendments Nos. 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, and 109, relating to certain assay offices: Appropriates for those at Helena, Mont., New York, N. Y., and Salt Lake City, Utah, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments No. 200 and 201: Strikes out the appropriation of $5,000, as proposed by the Senate, for an additional assistant secretary of Commerce and Labor.

On amendment No. 202: Extends the investigation of trade relations abroad by the Department of Commerce and Labor to the United States and the insular possessions.

On amendment No. 205: Appropriates $10,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $8,000, as proposed by the House, for collating and publishing tariffs of foreign countries.

On amendment No. 218: Restores the appropriation of $25,000, proposed by the House, for completing the testing machine at Pittsburg.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on amendments Nos. 99, 100, 101, and 102, relating to the assay office at Charlotte, N. C.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing and binding for Congress, including the proceedings and debates, $1,861,850. And printing and binding for Congress chargeable to this appropriation, when recommended to be done by the Committee on Printing of either House, shall be so recommended in a report containing an approximate estimate of the cost thereof, together with a statement from the Public Printer of estimated approximate cost of work previously ordered by Congress, within the fiscal year for which this appropriation is made.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Page 216, after line 24, insert as a new paragraph:

"In case any Senator, Representative, or Delegate shall fail to pay the cost of printing extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or other documents ordered by him to be printed in accordance with section 37 of the act approved January 12, 1895 (28 Stat. L., p. 606), the Public Printer shall certify the amount due to the Sergeant at Arms of the House or the financial clerk of the Senate, as the case may be, and the Sergeant at Arms or the financial clerk shall deduct from any salary due to said delinquents the said amount or as much thereof as the salary due may cover, and pay the amount so obtained to the Public Printer to be applied by him to the satisfaction of the indebtedness."

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not know anything about this, and I would like to hear something about it.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I would say to the gentleman that there is a similar provision applying to the stationery room, directing the Sergeant at Arms to retain out of the pay of Members and Delegates any balance that may be due to the stationery clerk. This is extending the law so as to give the Public Printer the benefit of the same provision in case Members should order the printing of speeches and other printing done and neglect to pay for it. It is putting the Public Printer on the same basis with the stationery clerk, under the rule.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A question or two, Mr. Chairman. I assume that the Public Printer required payment in advance for all orders for speeches printed or extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Now, I understand that in some instances he has granted a little leniency in time of payment, but if this amendment shall be made, will it not open up a general credit system to Members of the House?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I do not think so.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will it not be regarded as the opening up of accounts to Members to be certified over to the Sergeant at Arms for payment?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. It only applies to delinquents. The gentleman will find the word "delinquents" is in the amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the amendment is all right if the Public Printer will continue to insist upon payment in advance, but of course occasionally a Member may not have his check book in his pocket, who would be granted time to make payment later, and who might go away and forget it, and there ought to be a way of reaching such a case.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I regret to say to the gentleman there is necessity and occasion for this amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Necessity and occasion—does the gentleman mean, and I will not press him further, that there are debts of this kind existing?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Then, so far as I am concerned, the man who owes them can make the point of order.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this proposed amendment is a reflection upon the membership of the House, but as I am going out and as the gentleman has declared there is necessity for the adoption of the amendment, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF DOCUMENTS.

For superintendent of documents, $3,500; assistant superintendent of documents, $2,500; 1 clerk of class 4; 4 clerks of class 3; 4 clerks of class 2; 8 clerks of class 1; 8 clerks, at $1,000 each; 6 clerks, at $900 each; 11 clerks, at $720 each; 1 cataloguer in charge, $1,800; 2 cataloguers, at $1,500 each; 3 cataloguers, at $1,200 each; 1 cataloguer, $1,100; 7 cataloguers, at $1,000 each; 5 cataloguers, at $900 each; cashier, $1,600; 1 librarian, $1,500; shipper in charge, $1,200; stock keeper, $1,100; 3 stock keepers, at $1,000 each; 5 stock keepers, at $900 each; 2 stock keepers, at $720 each; 2 assistant messengers, at $720 each; 3 mailers, at $840 each; janitress, $626; 2 folders, at $626 each; 11 laborers, at $626 each; 5 messenger boys, at $420 each; in all, $100,384.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I am going to have another try at a point of order. I make the point of order on the increase of salary to be found on page 222, in line 5, "$3,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman to make the point of order to the words "five hundred?"

Mr. MACON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by substituting "$3,000"——

The CHAIRMAN. It does not require any amendment. The gentleman simply moves to strike out the words "five hundred."

The Clerk read as follows:

FORTIFICATIONS, ISTHMIAN CANAL.

For construction of seacoast batteries on the Canal Zone, $2,000,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass——

Mr. KEIFER. One moment, Mr. Chairman; I reserve the point of order——

Mr. TAWNEY. But the paragraph has not been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio reserves the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent to pass these two paragraphs and read the remainder of the bill, beginning with section 2. That will complete the bill, then, with the exception of fortifications and the items for public buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to pass over the paragraph, lines 13 to 18, page 229. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. All funds collected by the government of the Canal Zone from rentals of public lands and buildings in the Canal Zone and the cities of Panama and Colon, and from the zone postal service, and from court fees and fines, and collected or raised by taxation in whatever form under the laws of the government of the Canal Zone, are hereby appropriated until and including June 30, 1912, as follows: The revenues derived from the postal service to the maintenance of that service; the remaining revenues, including any balances unexpended in prior years, after setting aside a miscellaneous and contingent fund of not exceeding $10,000, to the maintenance of the public-school system in the zone; to the construction and maintenance of public improvements within the zone; to the maintenance of the administrative districts; to the maintenance of Canal Zone charity patients in the hospitals of the Isthmian Canal Commission, and to the maintenance of administrative district prisoners. A detailed and classified statement of all receipts and expenditures without the duplication of items under this paragraph shall be submitted to Congress after the close of the fiscal year 1912.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman a question bearing on section 2. It says, "Hereafter the Panama Railroad Co. shall carry no insurance to cover marine or fire losses." What is the purpose of that, may I ask?

Mr. TAWNEY. The purpose of that is to save to the Government of the United States about $40,000 a year in the premiums paid to the insurance companies for marine and fire insurance in the past. The reason for it—of course the gentleman from Tennessee knows that the Government carries no insurance on its property, or, rather, it carries its own insurance. The Government of the United States owns all the stock of the Panama Railroad Co. It is virtually a Government institution and belongs to the Government, and the premiums we paid prior to incorporating this into law averaged about $40,000 a year. Now, the gentleman will remember, I think it was about three years ago when this provision was first inserted, and it was then provided that the Panama Canal Commission, in case of loss, was authorized to loan to the Panama Railroad Co. an amount sufficient to enable the company—or to pay to the Panama Railroad Company an amount sufficient to reimburse it for the loss—so that the railroad company, that furnishes and maintains a commissary on the Canal Zone, would have money with which to buy new supplies to meet those which were destroyed by fire.

But since that time the earnings of the Panama Canal Railroad have increased and the credit of the Panama Railway Co. is such now that, in case of loss of that kind, it could borrow from the banks where necessary to meet any emergency that might arise. And for that reason the commission has recommended that the change be made as we provided here in section 2.

Mr. GARRETT. I understand perfectly well the good policy of the Government in not carrying its own insurance. I have to confess that I am not very familiar with marine insurance, however, and I was just wondering——

Mr. TAWNEY. That is insurance on the vessels alone.

Mr. GARRETT. That is what I was going to inquire. Is it on the vessels alone or on the cargo?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is on the vessels. The Government of the United States is in no way responsible for the loss of the cargo. Of course, in these cases, nearly all of it is our own cargo.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the loss is of the vessels, of course the Government will stand that loss.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask a question concerning that same paragraph. I notice it provides that no further payment of principal or interest be made. Have there been losses?

Mr. TAWNEY. That relates to another matter. I will say that two years ago last summer there was a loss, and it was made good by a provision to make it good to the railroad company. It was something like $60,000 or $70,000. The language I think which the gentleman from Nebraska is inquiring about relates to notes that were given at the beginning of this project.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And since——

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, the Panama Railroad Co. is relocated, or will be relocated, at the end of the next fiscal year, and this is done for the purpose of relieving the Treasury Department from the necessity of this bookkeeping transaction, because that is all it was. At the beginning of this project we did not own all of the stock of the Panama Railroad Co. There were outstanding shares, and all money that was appropriated for the reconstruction of the railroad was loaned to the Panama Railroad Co., since which time we have obtained possession of every share of the stock, and of course it is a debt we all owe now to ourselves, and it is merely to obviate the necessity of taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course I take it that in acquiring the stock there was a full settlement with the stockholders as to the interest and the notes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Of course, the original stockholders were fully compensated.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I understood the gentleman to say that the Government owned every share of stock in the Panama Railroad Co.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. If it be true that the Government owns every share of stock in the Panama Railroad Co., why is it necessary that there should be kept in New York expensive offices and expensive officers of that railroad company—general counsel, headquarters, and all that sort of thing?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that while the Government owns the stock, the Government is operating the railroad and a steamship line under the charter given to it from the State of New York. That is its official residence.

The official residence of the Panama Railroad Co. is in New York, and it must have offices there in order to transact its business, because, while it owns the Panama Railroad, that runs from Colon to Panama, it also owns a line of steamboats that ply between New York and Colon.

Mr. NORRIS. That is, the railroad company owns the steamboats?

Mr. TAWNEY. The railroad company.

Mr. NORRIS. And they must maintain the corporation the same as any other corporation?

Mr. TAWNEY. They must maintain their corporate status in New York the same as any other corporation, and they must have their office and transact their business there. They can not do otherwise. If they did not maintain a corporate organization there they would lose their charter, and we would have to operate the whole thing with purely departmental officers at the seat of government or some place else.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I thought the railroad was operated by the Secretary of War.

Mr. TAWNEY. The railroad is not operated by the Secretary of War.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Did not the Secretary of War, not very many months ago, make a contract with a company that runs boats from San Francisco?

Mr. TAWNEY. As an officer of the Panama Railroad Co.; yes. He is an officer of the Panama Railroad Co., and the chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission is the president of the railroad. The Secretary of War is one of the directors of the company, and I suppose he has general charge of the business policy, possibly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Then I want to ask the gentleman another question in that connection. Is it true that he made a contract with a steamship company on the Pacific side, giving them perhaps twice as much of the tonnage as was hitherto allowed?

Mr. TAWNEY. Allowed to whom?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. To the company owning and operating steamships carrying freight from San Francisco to New York.

Is it not true that he or his subordinates, whoever they were, during the past year entered into a contract with that company, giving them something like twice the proportion of charges that they hitherto received?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not answer the question positively. I would say it is not true on general principles, but I have no information upon the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Then how much does it lack of being true?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know. I know that a contract of some kind was made.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The newspapers reported the fact that there was a tremendous difference in the business given to that steamship line, giving them a freight charge much larger and a larger proportion of the freight than they had hitherto received.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know whether it was the result of a contract or not, but whatever was the cause, the steamboats of the Panama Railroad Co. plying between Colon and New York are carrying anywhere from twice to three times the amount of freight from the Pacific coast now that they were carrying a year ago. I do not know what the cause of it is, but I understand that is a fact.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I do not know how a privately owned steamship line could have all the freight to haul.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to any increase in the postal rates on second-class mail matter. The amendment proposed to be put on the Post Office appropriation bill in the Senate to do so is a tax on intelligence and an imposition on the reading people of our country. I trust it will be signally defeated in the Senate when the matter comes to a vote. In this connection I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read in my time, as a part of my remarks, a splendid letter written by our former colleague, the Hon. William R. Hearst, to his friend Col. John Temple Graves, which was published yesterday in the Washington Post, and elucidates the whole question in an able way and a commendable manner. I hope every taxpayer in the country will read this patriotic letter of Mr. Hearst, and then write to his Member of Congress about what he thinks of the iniquity to increase postal rates on second-class mail matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEARST ASSAILS MAGAZINE TAX.

WASHINGTON, February 24, 1911.

The Washington Post publishes the following:

The views of William R. Hearst on the proposition to increase the postage rate on magazines are given in the following letter, received from Mr. Hearst by John Temple Graves in this city:

FEBRUARY 17, 1911.

DEAR MR. GRAVES: I have heartily supported many of Mr. Taft's measures, and did so simply because I considered them valuable to the country and worthy of my support and of every man's support.

The measures, therefore, of Mr. Taft's which I supported were considered entirely upon the basis of propriety and the general welfare. The question of excessive magazine taxation, which I am going to oppose, I am considering wholly upon the same basis.

It is true that I and a member of my family are interested in magazines and that I would be somewhat affected by magazine taxation; but that fact, I am quite confident, has had no influence whatever upon my position on this question. I think I am above financial considerations of that kind.

I supported Mr. Taft's corporation tax, although 11 of my publications are incorporated and have to pay the tax. Furthermore, I continue these publications in corporate form and pay the tax, although I could at any moment transform them into personal possessions and avoid the tax.

Furthermore, I am one of the most ardent advocates of Mr. Taft's income-tax plan, although I will also be a considerable taxpayer under that system when it becomes a law.

It is only reasonable, therefore, to assume that in opposing this excessive magazine tax I am not seeking to avoid legitimate taxation, but am merely trying to prevent the passage of a measure which would not only be unjust to all magazine publishers, but injurious to the public generally.

What are the magazines upon which it is proposed to levy this tax? A magazine may be described as a collection of the best literature and the most valuable informative articles in so cheap and convenient and popular a form that this educational matter is easily obtained and assimilated by the great mass of the reading public.

I consider the gradual reduction of the price of the magazine from 35 cents to 10 and 15 cents to have been one of the most beneficial achievements of the nineteenth century, since it placed this good literature and valuable information within the reach of almost every American citizen and added what may be called a post-graduate course to the education furnished by our public schools.

The magazine is so creditable a production and so valuable an influence in American life and growth that it is almost as important that magazines of good character should be cheap as that public schools should be free.

The attempt to return magazines to the previously expensive basis I consider almost as serious a blow to popular education as a proposition to place the public schools upon a pay-school basis.

If, therefore, the Post Office Department were, as it asserts, carrying the magazines at a loss, it would merely be doing a creditable thing. But the Post Office Department is not carrying the magazines at a loss. It is merely carrying the magazines at a cheap rate, and there can be no question about the desirability of the Government performing this service nor about the duty of the Government to perform it.

Any attempt to make the people's press a high-priced press, out of the reach of the mass of the reading public, is just as serious a blow at a free and popular press as an attempt to restrict its liberties of utterance.

The magazines which are so cheap nowadays as to be within the reach of all are not cheaply produced. On the contrary, they are very expensively produced. They are produced on the best paper, with the best type, with the best art work, and with the best literature, and they can only be sold at a cheap price because of the advertisements which they carry. The profit on these advertisements is the thing which enables the best class of artists and the best class of writers to be engaged, and high-class art work and high-class literature to be disseminated at a small price to the general public.

The attempt to tax these advertisements, therefore, is an attempt to tax out of existence either the high quality of the magazine or the low price of the magazine. Either of these results would be most disastrous to the general welfare of the community, and therefore this proposition of the Post Office Department is, to my mind, so dangerous as to call for the opposition of every patriotic citizen in the United States.

I would go so far as to say that if this measure should become a law it would be the simple duty of every thoughtful American citizen who believes in popular education and realizes that the safe conduct of a republic depends upon the educated intelligence of its people to do his utmost to administer the severest possible rebuke to the administration responsible for so dangerous and disastrous a measure.

It is asserted, and of course admitted, that the Post Office Department is conducted at a loss. So are the State Department, and the Army and Navy Departments, and the Interior Department, and the Agricultural Department, and the Labor Department, and the Judicial Department, and the Executive Department—sometimes at a heavy loss, but, let us hope, always for the benefit of the people.

I am willing to admit, however, that the Post Office Department should not be conducted at a loss if it is possible properly and advantageously to conduct it at a profit.

There are two ways of transforming a deficit into a surplus. One plan is by increased taxation, which has been the refuge of every incompetent government in the history of the world, and the other plan is by economical business administration, and this has always been the distinguishing mark of those governments which have deserved the approval of the people and the considerate attention of history.

Any blundering incompetent can plunder the public to raise money to conduct a department extravagantly. The test of ability in public or private business is to conduct a proposition successfully without excessive expenditure, but with such intelligent economy and such elimination of useless expense as to create a surplus instead of a deficit.

The choice of the Post Office Department in the present instance lies between reckless taxation and economical administration, and if the Government would give as much attention and as much effort to conducting the Post Office Department economically as it is now giving to the attempt to tax a valuable educational institution out of existence, the Government would deserve the high praise, instead of the stern censure, of the community.

I know something about the cost of distribution of publications. I know something about the reasons for the excessive cost of distribution in the post office. And I say that the high cost of distribution in the post office is largely due to loose and careless and reckless methods, to antiquated systems and incompetent management.

It is estimated that 40 per cent of the charged weight of mail matter is composed of cumbersome mail bags and their heavy iron locks and fastenings.

How absurd to imagine that a man who wanted to break into a mail bag would be deterred by a ponderous lock.

The Post Office Department might as well insist that a burglar-proof lock be affixed to every letter, under the inane impression that the only way to tear open a letter would be to pick a lock.

I know, too, personally and positively, of an instance where the great mass of western mail was sent over one railroad and when the bulk of it was transferred to another railroad all the postal clerks previously employed were maintained on the first railroad for over two years after the mail had been transferred.

Of course, the cost of distributing the mail is great under such loose and clumsy business methods.

The Evening Journal, without any of the powers of the great United States Government behind it, distributes its product for seven-tenths of a cent a pound, and included in this average is the 1-cent-a-pound rate paid to the Government for copies mailed. Obviously, then, the proportion of the product which is not carried by the post office is delivered for much less than seven-tenths of a cent per pound.

The New York American distributes by mail and express 303,584 pounds of daily and Sunday papers every week at a cost of $1,655.17, or little over one-half a cent per pound. This average includes 28,028 pounds sent by mail at 1 cent per pound, so, obviously, the average of matter not distributed by mail is less than one-half a cent per pound.

The New York American sends 67,268 pounds of these papers over the Pennsylvania Railroad at one-fourth of a cent per pound, or one-fourth the rate paid to the United States Post Office Department.

That same rate—one-fourth of a cent per pound—is exactly the rate charged by the Canadian Government for carrying magazines by mail through its post office department and for distributing them over a thinly populated territory even greater than the United States.

If, then, the Pennsylvania Railroad can make a profit carrying printed matter at a rate of one-fourth of a cent per pound, and the Canadian post office under more difficult conditions than ours can carry mailed magazines at one-fourth of a cent per pound, how ridiculous to assert that the United States Government, with all its opportunities and facilities, can not distribute the magazines profitably at 1 cent a pound.

The express companies carry publications in bulk, in many instances, far cheaper than the Government mails will carry them. They would carry those publications individually cheaper if the Government would allow a private institution to conduct that branch of the governmental business. The magazine publishers could get together and distribute their own product as cheaply as the Government now distributes it, or more cheaply if the Government would allow the magazines to have the privileges which it arrogates to itself.

How absurd, then, to assert that the Government can not distribute the magazines profitably at this present rate when it handles the magazines along with all other mail distributed and without any particular extra expense because of them.

Even if, as I said, the Government were handling the magazines at a loss, it would be doing a creditable thing. But it is not handling the magazines at a loss. It is carrying them at a profit, and if it taxes the magazines out of existence it will compel the Postal Department to be conducted at a greater loss than the loss at which it is now conducted.

What inconsistency, too, for the administration to advocate a Government subsidy to restore a United States merchant marine and at the same time advocate a measure to put out of existence a much more important American institution.

If it is a Republican policy to promote business and encourage industry, and a proper Republican and American policy to take money out of the United States Treasury to subsidize a private business in order to create an industry, why is it not a proper Republican and American policy to continue to provide a cheap mail rate in order to maintain a great American industry and perpetuate a mighty educational influence already existent?

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Hereafter the Panama Railroad Co. shall not be required to give bond, either with or without surety, in contracts which it may make to furnish services, materials, or supplies to the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or other departments of the Government, and such contracts may be made for periods less than one year, as may be agreed on, and formal contracts in writing shall not be required unless agreed on.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. I suppose the gentleman wants some information in regard to it.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Panama Railroad Co., being a corporate organization, or ostensibly an independent organization in the Government service, when it sells provisions to the Navy Department or to the Marine Corps, is required to give a bond, and the expense of that bond cost the Government of the United States in one instance, as I recall now from the hearings, $193. The effect of this provision is to enable the Panama Railroad Co. to deal with other departments of the Government on the Canal Zone with respect to furnishing supplies and materials that apply generally to all departments or any department of the Government dealing with another department of the Government. It is to relieve the company from the necessity of giving a bond.

Mr. GARRETT. I think I understand.

Mr. TAWNEY. The head of the commissary department down there urged this very strongly, for two reasons: One is the amount of time lost in advertising and the annoyance in complying with all of the rules and regulations that are imposed upon outside companies doing business with the Government; the other was the requirement of a bond.

Now, for example, when he, at the head of the commissary department, makes an offer or accepts a bid of the Marine Corps for subsistence, he must make a bid for a period of six months. He bids higher at the time, for the purpose of covering any possible increase in the price of articles of subsistence that may occur during the six months or a year, and it is costing the Marine Corps and Navy Department more for articles of subsistence than it would if simply furnished by the Navy Department and paid for in the ordinary way of doing business between the various bureaus of the department.

Mr. GARRETT. This is to do away with a system which has been rendered archaic by virtue of the Government becoming the sole owner of the Panama Railroad?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is right; the word "archaic" is exactly right. Mr. Chairman, this completes the reading of the bill, with the exception of two items—the fortification of the Panama Canal and the public-building items, which cover the first 60 pages of this bill. The Supervising Architect has gone over all of the public-building items of the bill, has corrected all the typographical and other errors, including the one in respect to the immigrant station at Baltimore, where the bill carries only $10,000 while the committee recommended $110,000. I do not know whether the Members of the House care to remain here to-night for the purpose of reading or having read these 61 pages of public-building items. I think they have all had time to carefully examine them. Every Member who has any appropriation in that bill seems to be satisfied with the action of the committee. I have heard no complaints thus far against the recommendations of the committee.

Members of the House understand that the committee has treated them absolutely on the square; there has been no favoritism shown, except in the three instances I referred to yesterday—one in Texas and the other in Washington where the buildings are located at the capital of the State, the only two that are so located, and the other at Gettysburg, where it is desired to complete the building in time for the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of that battle.

I was going to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that we consider as read, beginning at page 5, line 19, down to and including page 61, line 15. That includes all of the public-building items and nothing but public-building items.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. On page 26, provision for Greenwood, Miss., post office, it says, "for site and completion of present building, $30,000." The amount authorized by the public-buildings bill is $60,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. The other $30,000 has been appropriated. If the gentleman will look at the document furnished by the Supervising Architect he will find there all the appropriations under existing authorizations up to the present time, and the reason that there is only $30,000 carried in this bill for that item is that you have had the other $30,000.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, there is a similar case in the matter in which I am interested. That is for Union City, Tenn.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is for the continuation. The limitation of cost is $50,000.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; I understand the situation.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, there is an item on page 13 of the bill—

Bristol, Pa., post office: For site and continuation of building under present limit, $40,000.

The Secretary of the Treasury acquired the site in 1909, but no work has been done upon it. Since the alignment of the Philadelphia & Trenton Railroad through Bristol, being a part of the great Pennsylvania line to New York, has been shifted, so that the present post-office site, which was adjacent to the railroad station, will be half a mile from the new station, it is desired that the Secretary of the Treasury should at his discretion have the authority to exchange that site for a suitable site nearer the new station, and for such an amount of cash as might represent the difference in value, if any, between the two sites; and if he receives cash that amount shall be appropriated, together with the appropriation carried in the bill. The proposition is entirely on the side of the Government. It is favored by the Secretary of the Treasury, who has written a letter to the honorable chairman of the committee, and I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which I send to the desk may be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 7, on page 13, strike out the period and insert a colon and the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, in his discretion, in lieu of erecting the said post-office building upon the site at the south corner of Pond and Mulberry Streets, to exchange said site for (a) a suitable site in the vicinity of the railroad station about to be established in the neighborhood of Prospect Street, Beaver Dam Road, and Jefferson Avenue, in the said borough of Bristol, on the new alignment in said borough of the Philadelphia & Trenton Railroad, and (b) the payment by the owner or owners of such new site to said Secretary of such amount in cash as may equal the fair difference in value, if any, between such sites. In the event of such exchange, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to erect the post-office building upon the site so acquired, and to execute a quit-claim deed to the person or persons conveying such new site to the United States, conveying all rights, title, claim, and interest of the United States in and to said site at the south corner of Pond and Mulberry Streets. And in the event of the Secretary of the Treasury receiving a payment in such exchange, the amount thereof in addition to the foregoing sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated toward the erection of said post-office building."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the necessity for this legislation grows out of the fact that the station in close proximity to which the site was purchased and the building located has been moved by the railroad company to half a mile from the present site of the railroad station. And I find from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury that he recommends this change, and the amendment which has been offered does not increase the limit of cost so that there could be no greater expenditure by reason of the change. Unless the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which has jurisdiction of this legislation, objects, I will not interpose any objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I will say that I submitted this to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and he said he had no objection to it at all, that he thought it was in the public interest, and that the amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Minnesota, as the Chair understands, asks unanimous consent that that portion of the bill, beginning with line 18, on page 4, and ending with line 15, on page 61, which was heretofore passed without prejudice, shall now be considered as having been read, subject to the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; and also three minor amendments, which are made necessary by reason of corrections sent to the committee by the Supervising Architect. For example—I will read so that there will be no misunderstanding—on page 6, line 1, strike out the word "Michigan" and insert the word "Minnesota." It was printed "Anoka, Mich.," instead of "Anoka, Minn."

Then on page 8, in line 22, before the word "ten," insert the words "one hundred and," so that it would read "$110,000." That is the Baltimore immigrant station.

On page 30, line 4, strike out the words "and courthouse." They have inadvertently inserted those words in connection with the Huntington, Ind., post office, when there is no authorization for anything other than a post office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again state the requests for unanimous consent of the gentleman from Minnesota, that that portion of the bill beginning with line 18, page 4, and ending with line 15, page 61, heretofore passed without prejudice, shall now be considered as read, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which has been read to the committee, and the amendments just read by the gentleman from Minnesota, be considered as agreed to. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may be permitted to correct all totals in the bill made necessary by the amendments, to correspond with the amended amounts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in respect to the Panama Canal fortification item, which is now left, I ask unanimous consent that one hour be allowed the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] and one hour the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], with the right to yield to Members for and against the proposition such time as they may desire. I will say that this does not preclude the possibility of further debate at the expiration of the two hours. I do not want Members to think that this will cut off any opportunity for debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman I hope it does not provide that we shall continue debate for two hours if we do not want to.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is understood that the debate need not continue for two hours unless there is demand for it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And that the vote shall be taken whenever the debate is closed.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; the vote should be taken when debate closes, either under this arrangement or, if debate is continued under the five-minute rule, the vote is to be taken at the conclusion of debate under the five-minute rule. Of course, debate under the five-minute rule is under the control of the committee, and the committee can close debate at any time. This subject is one that involves the establishment of an entirely new policy, and it is one of the most important questions that Congress has considered at this session. For that reason I make this request.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, while I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations and while I very rarely endeavor to break in on debate on a matter coming from any other committee but my own, yet I have worked on this canal matter for about 14 years, and I hope some time before this debate closes I can get a few minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the gentleman from Georgia will be given opportunity.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Minnesota have any idea now as to how long he would care to have debate run?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think anywhere between now and 9 o'clock.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That probably will accomplish it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Anywhere between now and 9 o'clock.

Mr. FITZGERALD. General debate——

Mr. TAWNEY. Two hours for general debate and then under the five-minute rule, and Members have opportunity to extend their remarks if they desire to do so.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLMSTED). The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that that portion of the bill——

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what the limitation is as to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state it so that the gentleman will understand. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that that portion of the bill beginning with line 13, on page 229, and ending with line 18, on the same page, relating to fortifications of the Isthmian Canal, heretofore passed without prejudice, shall now be considered, and debate in the nature of general debate may proceed for two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] and the other by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], and neither to be required to occupy all the time [applause], and at the expiration of that time debate under the five-minute rule shall be as usual.

Mr. TAWNEY. Shall proceed under the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Not to be affected by this unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand some gentlemen on this side of the House, on both sides of the proposition, probably, want to speak. Now, if you exhaust the two hours of general debate, of course, under a strict interpretation of the rule, there are but two five-minute speeches on a side.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama there is no disposition on my part, or on the part of any man who is opposed to this proposition, to take advantage of the rule. Opportunity is to be given, at least until 9 o'clock, and that is only tentative, for full discussion of this proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand the gentleman from Minnesota, there will be full opportunity under the five-minute rule.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; under the five-minute rule. This is done in order to present this matter fully from the standpoint of both sides of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the minority members of the committee, before I made this request, had agreed to the division of the time between the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Ohio as representing the two opposing sides on this question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the gentlemen on the two sides having this time for general debate. The only thing I wanted to have understood was that there would be ample opportunity under the five-minute rule for gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. That will be accorded to members of the committee, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the time consumed in the discussion and determination of the question of order is not to come out of the two hours allotted to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the two hours' debate is to be consumed before the question of order is determined. The point of order has been reserved and that question can remain in abeyance until the close of debate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in 1850 there was ratified what is known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty between Great Britain and the United States with reference to the construction of an isthmian canal. For reasons which are quite manifest it was then agreed that neither nation would alone construct this great canal. With the lapse of years we desired to build this canal by ourselves and entered into negotiations with Great Britain for the abrogation or modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850. That treaty in express terms forbade the fortification of the canal therein contemplated, and when the new treaty, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, was negotiated it contained an equally positive prohibition of the fortification of the new canal. That treaty contained a provision by which the United States and Great Britain jointly adopted certain rules for the neutralization of the new canal, and contained a further provision that the other nations of the world would be invited to adhere to the stipulations of neutralization.

When that treaty came before the Senate of the United States it was amended, not by striking out the prohibition of fortification, but by inserting a provision that the United States might defend the canal, and by striking out the provision that the nations of the world should be invited to adhere to the provisions for its neutralization. It has been lately frequently suggested that this canal could be defended and protected by treaties with the nations of the earth, guaranteeing its neutrality. I want to call your particular attention to the fact that it was the American people and not the British people that instituted negotiations for the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that it contained such a guaranty from England, and providing for inviting the nations of the earth to adhere to that declaration of neutralization; and it was the Senate of the United States that struck out the provisions for inviting the nations of the world to adhere to the neutralization provisions of that treaty.

When this treaty as amended by the Senate was transmitted to the British Government it refused to accept the treaty as thus amended, and did it for several reasons, prominent among which was the fact that we had stricken out the provision to invite the other nations of the earth to adhere to the provisions with reference to the neutralization of this canal. And Great Britain took the position that she could not afford to be bound by a contract to respect the canal and its neutrality alone of all the great nations of the earth; that if we were unwilling to invite the other nations to adhere she would be bound to respect this canal, and no belligerent with whom she might be at war would be so bound.

The hour had struck, it seems to me, for the United States to determine then whether it wanted to neutralize this canal by treaties with the nations of the earth or whether it intended to depend upon the military and naval forces of the United States for its defense and rely upon our own strength. We refused, even in the treaty that we were seeking to negotiate, to allow a provision to remain that would invite the nations of the earth to adhere to these neutralization provisions. What an attitude would we be in if applying for a treaty to enable us to build this canal, we caused its rejection by refusing to accede to a provision that we would invite the nations of the earth to adhere, and thereby lost the treaty we desired, to announce to the world with a vacillating temper that we want to do those things by which we lost this treaty rather than to do.

When these negotiations terminated because of our refusal to invite the nations of the earth to adhere, new negotiations took place for a new treaty that could meet the objections of the various parties to the old Hay-Pauncefote treaty. And a new treaty was made, and I now read from a memorandum from Lord Lansdowne, which was sent to be shown to the British ambassador here, with reference to the new, or the second, Hay-Pauncefote treaty. He says:

> While the amendment reserving to the United States the right of providing for the defense of the canal is no longer pressed for, the first portion of rule 7, providing that no fortification shall be erected commanding the canal or the adjacent waters, has been omitted. The latter part of the rule has been incorporated in rule 2 of the new draft.

It was no longer necessary to explicitly provide for the right of defense on the part of the United States when we had stricken from the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty the provision that the canal should not be fortified.

For more than 50 years we had been bound not to fortify this canal, bound by solemn treaty obligation; and now, with both parties considering the question, we struck from this new treaty the provision against fortification. And yet gentlemen would have us believe that this alteration, to which attention was called on both sides of the Atlantic, meant nothing whatever and we still had no right to fortify the canal.

I again read from the memorandum of Lord Lansdowne:

In form the new draft differs from the convention of 1900, under which the high contracting parties, after agreeing that the canal might be constructed by the United States, undertook to adopt certain rules as the basis upon which the canal should be neutralized. In the new draft the United States intimate their readiness "to adopt" somewhat similar rules as the basis of the neutralization of the canal. It would appear to follow that the whole responsibility for upholding these rules, and thereby maintaining the neutrality of the canal, would henceforward be assumed by the Government of the United States.

The change of form is an important one; but in view of the fact that the whole cost of the construction of the canal is to be borne by that Government, which is also to be charged with such measures as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder, His Majesty's Government are not likely to object to it.

This new treaty not only struck out the provision against fortification and struck out the provision that we would invite the nations of the earth to adhere to rules for the neutralization of this canal, but it went further, and the United States alone adopted certain rules for the neutralization of this canal in place of the United States and Great Britain, as in the former treaty. Having refused the treaty in which England joined in the neutralization in part by reason of its inviting other nations to share in the defense of the canal with us, it is now suggested that we go back to England and tell her that with vacillating mind we rejected it then, but that we would be glad to have it now, and would be glad to have her give us the treaty now that we then refused to accept. [Laughter.]

Now, nothing can be more important in construing the last treaty than the memorandum of the American Secretary of State, sent to the Senate when it was considering that treaty, and explanatory of it as it was understood on the American side at that time. I have here that memorandum, and I want to call the attention of the members of this committee to some of the matters contained in Secretary Hay's memorandum on that subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Was that memorandum submitted to Great Britain?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That memorandum was not submitted to the British Government, but it will be discovered on reading Lord Lansdowne's memorandum and this memorandum that both understood it alike.

Mr. NORRIS. I submit that the memorandum submitted by our Secretary of State and not submitted to the other party should not be considered as final.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am only considering it as part of the res gestae while this treaty was being considered in the Senate. The great Secretary of State who had been making it one of the great works of his life to negotiate this treaty sends to the American Senate his impressions of it, his views and opinions concerning it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Your contention is that the position you take now in regard to this is in line with the memorandum?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is the memorandum both of Lord Lansdowne and Secretary Hay.

Mr. CLAYTON. I agree with you.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Do you have to go to other papers to ascertain the meaning?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think not; but gentlemen have contended that in some way it forbids fortifications.

AS TO THE RIGHT OF THE UNITED STATES, NOTWITHSTANDING THE NEUTRAL RULES ADOPTED BY THE TREATY, TO DEFEND ITSELF BY ITS OWN FORCES, AND TO SECURE THE MAINTENANCE OF PUBLIC ORDER, COVERED BY WHAT WAS GENERALLY KNOWN AS THE DAVIS AMENDMENT.

His Majesty's Government criticized the vagueness of the language employed in the amendment, and the absence of all security as to the manner in which its ends might at some future time be interpreted; but thought that, however precisely it might be worded, it would be impossible to determine what might be the effect if one clause permitting defensive measures and another clause (which has now been omitted) prohibiting fortification of the canal were allowed to stand side by side in the same convention.

Great Britain thought that there ought not to be a provision there that we might defend the canal as an amendment to the treaty which forbade its fortifications, and that matter was settled in the second treaty by striking out the prohibition of fortification.

This amendment was strenuously objected to by Great Britain as involving a distinct departure from the principle of neutrality which had theretofore found acceptance by both Governments, inasmuch as it would, as construed by Lord Lansdowne, permit the United States in time of peace as well as in time of war to resort to whatever warlike acts it pleased in and near the canal, which would be clearly inconsistent with its intended neutral character and would deprive the commerce and navies of the world of the free use of it.

It was insisted that by means of the amendment the obligation of Great Britain to respect the neutrality of the canal under all circumstances would remain in force, while that of the United States, on the other hand, would be essentially modified, and that this would result in a one-sided agreement, by which Great Britain would be debarred from any warlike act in or near the canal, while the United States could resort to any such acts, even in time of peace, which it might deem necessary to secure its own safety.

Moreover, it was insisted that by this amendment, in connection with the third amendment, which excluded other powers from becoming parties to the contract, Great Britain would be placed at a great disadvantage as compared with all other powers, inasmuch as she alone, with all her vast interests in the commerce of the world, would be bound under all circumstances to respect the neutrality of the canal, while the United States, even in time of peace, would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal on the plea of necessity for its own safety, and all other powers not being bound by the treaty could at their pleasure disregard its provisions.

AS TO THE AMENDMENT STRIKING OUT THE ARTICLE IN THE TREATY AS SUBMITTED TO THE SENATE WHICH PROVIDED FOR AN INVITATION TO THE OTHER POWERS TO COME IN AND ADHERE TO IT.

This was emphatically objected to, because if acquiesced in by Great Britain she would be bound by what Lord Lansdowne described as the "stringent rules of neutral conduct" prescribed by the treaty, which would not be equally binding upon the other powers, and it was urged that the adhesion of other powers to the treaty as parties would furnish an additional security for the neutrality of the canal.

In the hope of reconciling the conflicting views thus presented between the former treaty as amended by the Senate and the objections thereto of the British Government, the treaty now submited for the consideration of the Senate was drafted.

The substantial differences from the former treaty are as follows:

First. In the new draft of treaty the provision superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as a whole, instead of being parenthetically inserted, as by the former Senate amendment, was made the subject of an independent article and presented as the first article of the treaty. It was thus submitted to the consideration of the British Government in connection with the other substantial provisions of the treaty which declared the neutrality of the canal for the use of all nations on terms of entire equality.

Second. By a change in the first line of Article III, instead of the United States and Great Britain jointly adopting as the basis of the neutralization of the canal the rules of neutrality prescribed for its use as was provided by the former treaty, the United States now alone adopts them.

This was regarded as a very radical and important change and one which would go far toward a reconciliation of the conflicting views of the two Governments.

It relieves Great Britain of all responsibility and obligation to enforce the neutrality of the canal, which by the former treaty had been imposed upon or assumed by her jointly with the United States, and thus meets the main stress of the objection which seemed to underlie or be interwoven with her other objections to the former Senate amendments. The United States alone, as the sole owner of the canal, as a purely American enterprise, adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of the canal shall be regulated, and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing, without the assistance of Great Britain or of any other nation, its absolute neutrality.

It was also believed that this change would be in harmony with the national wish that this great interoceanic waterway should not only be constructed and owned, but exclusively controlled and managed, by the United States.

Third. The next important change from the former treaty consists in the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" from clause 1 of Article III.

Mr. KEIFER. That is in the treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not in that part or in the same connection.

Mr. KEIFER. It was better arranged.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It does not mean the same thing.

Mr. KEIFER. It meant exactly what it said.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Let us see what John Hay said:

No longer insisting upon the language of the Davis amendment—which had in terms reserved to the United States express permission to disregard the rules of neutrality prescribed, when necessary to secure its own defense, which the Senate had apparently deemed necessary because the provision in Rule I, that the canal should be free and open "in time of war as in time of peace" to the vessels of all nations—it was considered that the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" would dispense with the necessity of the amendment referred to, and that war between the contracting parties, or between the United States and any other power, would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties when not specially otherwise provided, and would remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense and give to the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent, and to protect it and defend itself by whatever means might be necessary.

We struck those words from this treaty that we might insure that this treaty would not be binding in time of war as well as in time of peace. For it is fundamental that treaties not made in contemplation of war terminate upon war arising between the parties to the treaty. But a treaty made in contemplation of war remains in force in war as in peace, and so we struck out from this provision in the old treaty the words "in time of war as in time of peace" that this treaty might end with war so far as this feature was concerned and give us the right to defend the canal against all mankind.

Fourth. In conformity with the Senate's emphatic rejection of Article III of the former treaty, which provided that the high contracting parties would, immediately upon the exchange of ratifications, bring it to the notice of other powers and invite them to adhere to it, no such provision was inserted in the draft of the new treaty.

Because the Americans and not the British have rejected the theory of international neutrality it was omitted from this treaty. We had lost the other treaty because England wanted that and we refused it.

It was believed that the declaration that the canal should be free and open to all nations on terms of entire equality (now that Great Britain was relieved of all responsibility and obligation to enforce and defend its neutrality) would practically meet the force of the objection which had been made by Lord Lansdowne to the Senate's excision of the article inviting the other powers to come in, viz, that Great Britain was placed thereby in a worse position than other nations in case of war with the United States.

Fifth. The next change from the former treaty is the omission of the provision in clause 7 of Article III, which prohibited the fortification of the canal, and the transfer to clause 2 of the remaining provision of clause 7, that the United States shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

Now, it is true, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], that this treaty does contain the same language about "in time of war as in time of peace" in another connection, and I am going to discuss its meaning in that connection in discussing some of the provisions of this treaty. I have here the final Hay-Pauncefote treaty as ratified.

The first provision I desire to call attention to is that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all the nations "observing these rules." Now, if any nation attempts to violate the neutrality of this canal it is no longer entitled to the use of this canal. The canal is free and open to the ships of all nations that observe these rules, and not others, and there is not a thing in this treaty to prevent our excluding by force from the use of this canal any nation that does not observe these rules. I hope that every Member will be deeply impressed with the meaning of this phrase, "open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules;" not making a treaty to observe them; not making a treaty guaranteeing the neutrality of the canal, but every nation of this earth shall be entitled to the privileges of the canal so long, and only so long, as it observes the rules.

"The canal shall never be blockaded." In our strength and our courage and our pride we said we would not invite the nations of the earth to maintain the neutrality of this canal, but that the United States would itself adopt these rules, among them that this canal shall never be blockaded.

How are you going to prevent a blockade if you have not got any guns? The smallest naval power on earth can blockade this canal unless we have there in some form the instrumentalities of war to break the blockade. We did not specify how we would guarantee that this canal should not be blockaded, whether by ships of war or land defenses, but our solemn faith is plighted to the proposition that we will always protect this canal against blockade.

The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress.

This treaty provided that, though we are not in a strict sense sovereigns there, this treaty shall cover the usual 3 marine miles from shore, and that that shall be deemed a part of the canal that we are solemnly pledged that we will protect against blockade. I propose to insist upon the fortification of this canal, first, because when we struck from the treaty with Great Britain the provision to ask the nations of the earth to guarantee, and thereby forced her to renounce her guarantee of neutrality, we declared a great national policy, that, as we owned the canal, we would ourselves defend it against all comers.

I shall defend the fortification of this canal, because when we struck from the treaties of 50 years the provisions against fortification it was the plain understanding of both parties that we had the right to fortify. I shall defend the fortification of this canal, because the solemn faith of the Republic is pledged that we will protect this canal against blockade, and I shall insist that fortifications are essential to protect the canal against blockade, even by an inferior power. I shall insist that this canal shall be fortified, because it is the property of the Republic, and we have got the right to defend it against the whole world. [Applause.]

Now, if the United States wants to utilize this canal in time of war, to consolidate its fleet upon either coast, a single battleship stationed at the far end of the canal could prevent the passage of a gigantic fleet through the canal.

It is essential that those who do not observe the provisions for the neutralization of the canal shall be kept at such a distance that the American fleet can sail through and form and not be attacked one vessel at a time as it comes through this canal. We said we would not allow it to be blockaded. Much less will we allow it to be blockaded as against our own commerce and our own Navy.

We will have spent $400,000,000 chiefly for the purpose of increasing the power of the American Navy, and yet an utterly insignificant force at one end of this canal can absolutely preclude our passing through the canal and utilizing it for the purposes for which we spent $400,000,000 unless we can defend the ends of the canal and keep this enemy at a distance until our fleet can form after it has passed through the canal. Shall we take all the pains to get a treaty excluding the prohibition of fortification; shall we proudly repudiate an adherence of other nations and proclaim our purpose of having the canal in our own strength and then break our solemn pledge to the world that nobody shall be permitted to blockade this great ocean highway? Others may defend the fortification of the canal upon what grounds they please. Some may assert that we would be justified, even in violation of the treaty, in time of emergency in defending ourselves as best we could. I am not here to defend any proposition so shocking to public and to private morals. I am here to insist that we have the right to fortify the canal; that it is more than a right—we have contracted to preserve its neutrality and to protect it against blockade, and this makes it a solemn duty of this people to fortify the entrance of this canal as securely as any of the ports in the world. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the balance of my time——

Mr. NYE. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Most certainly.

Mr. NYE. Assuming it is wise to fortify, is it essential to pass this appropriation at this time?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is, and I take pleasure in explaining why. We have upon the canal the greatest organization that ever existed for the installation of concrete work. The emplacements of these fortifications will cost more than $4,000,000, and it is essential, as the work upon the locks draws to a close, that this great force shall not be scattered, but shall proceed with its splendid present organization to do this work much more cheaply, as it can be done by it, than by any other force. It will be a waste of money, a waste probably of millions if this be delayed for a single year, and I think that proposition would alone be sufficient, but it has been my experience in the work of eight years upon the Fortifications Committee that no great fortification is completed inside of two to three years from the time of the making of the appropriation, and seldom in so short a time as that. This canal will now be done before these fortifications will be completed. If we ought to have them at all, we certainly ought to have them when the canal is finished, and for their protection against destruction we need fortifications even before the canal is finished. Now, unless there are some other questions desired to be asked, I will reserve the balance of my time. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the magnitude of the question and the whole scope of the debate is so great that it is impossible to undertake to cover the ground in an hour, and I am not at liberty to use that hour myself. I will take but a few minutes in my opening remarks on this subject.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a great effort in this country—and my friend from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] has fallen into the same line of discussion—to convince people that neutralization of a piece of property, like a canal, that is to be used for public purposes by all the world, is capable of being or may be fortified, notwithstanding it is by treaty and otherwise guaranteed that it shall be neutralized. And great efforts are being made to make black seem white. Neutralization and fortification and its consequent blockade can not go together. In all international treaties neutralization means the exclusion of everything connected with war. Neutralization excludes everything, and my friend argues that unless you forbid something to be done by express provision in a neutralization treaty you may neutralize and at the same time vote war measures all along the line, however much they may conflict with neutralization and other expressly forbidden things.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is on the theory that we will have peace if we have to fight for it.

Mr. KEIFER. There is where another trouble of the gentleman comes in. There never was any occasion in the world for neutralization in peace. Neutralization is for war and for war conditions. But the gentleman argues that you may blockade the canal by seacoast defenses, although the treaties all expressly say it is never to be done. That is the argument, that is the testimony, that the first thing that is proposed to be done, as reported by the Fortification Board, is to put seacoast defenses at either end of this canal to blockade it. The gentleman says any nation could blockade it from without. A blockade never comes that way, but you do not need that. Any little roving ship of any kind that floats the sea, even if you have got a thousand battleships on the canal, can still blockade it from all the commerce of the world.

I am not going to go into the discussion now at length. The gentleman reads largely from a communication which he says was prepared by John Hay and sent to the United States Senate. He is misled about that. John Hay never prepared it, and it was a matter of remark that he did not do it. The document which he reads from was not prepared by him, but by somebody, possibly by a clerk, in the State Department that wanted to make an argument that way, and it was disregarded by the Senate. The treaty speaks for itself, and Hay negotiated and indorsed it, including all its neutralization. When the Senate came to deal with the treaty, the Senators, by action of their own, declared that the treaty neutralized the canal and forbade fortification. I am speaking of the treaty of November 18, 1901. But there was a man about the administration of this Government at the time the treaty was made and at the time it was sent to the Senate for ratification who was supposed to have known something about it, who passed some judgment on it, and he had something to say with reference to it. This is a part of what he declared:

> The treaty of November 18, 1901, was prepared to preserve the general principle of neutralization embodied as the settled policy of the United States Government in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty more than 50 years before.

That is what he declared constituted the November 18, 1901, Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. SHERLEY. Who said that?

Mr. KEIFER. The man who said that was Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, when he submitted it to the Senate and asked them to ratify it. They took him at his word. Some of them said, "No; we do not want that. Although it has been the settled policy of this Government since the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, we want the right to fortify the canal." There were six of them, as I recollect, who desired to retain a right to fortify and blockade the canal. They made motion after motion and offered amendment after amendment to amend that treaty so as to give such right, and they were always voted down. Then the treaty was ratified with the understanding that it subjected the canal to neutralization, nonfortification, and nonblockade.

I have not time to read the proceedings in the Senate, but I will put them in my remarks.

I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] for 10 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, as we have such a fine audience, I regret that I have not two or three hours at my command. This audience makes up in quality as much as it loses in numbers. [Applause.] The fixing of a limit for general debate is a signal for a hegira of the Members to escape long, dry speeches and return to vote at a time fixed; but some of my associates, learning that I was to speak at this time, have been kind enough to remain. I hope some of my absent brethren, who may vote wrong, will, when they read my speech, not consider me immodest to suggest that they might have avoided error by remaining and keeping their minds open to information on this subject. [Applause.]

I am glad on this occasion to be able to compliment both the distinguished leaders of this debate that in a measure they are both right. I can honestly take the time from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] and he can properly yield me time, because I am going to vote for his motion to strike out this section. I could not accept time from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], though while I agree with most of his propositions when the time comes to make them applicable, I am going to vote against him now. It is something remarkable that I should be able to agree with either of the gentlemen. Our schools of political thought are so different, because of environment, education, and party alignment, that when I find myself in accord with either I am reminded of those old ridiculous lines of Goldsmith's about—

> His conduct still right, with his argument wrong,
> The coachman was tipsy, the chariot drove home.

The canal should be fortified, as contended by the gentleman from Iowa, but not now. It should also be neutralized, as insisted by the gentleman from Ohio, but by us alone, unaided by other nations.

Now, as to whether or not to fortify the Panama Canal depends upon the angle of vision from which you view the subject. If you regard this Government as a commercial machine, making a canal for the benefit of either American commercial adventurers as a method of ship subsidy or as a free gift to the world in perpetual gratuity, you can talk about it as the gentleman from Ohio does. But if you take a correct view of it, as is taken by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], after we build this canal as a constitutional war and navy measure, the only warrant we ever had to build it, you can very readily reach the right conclusion and agree with me that the strip across the Isthmus of Panama ought to be used primarily for military and naval purposes. We have constructed it for those purposes, and we should so use it as to accelerate the passage of our own ships to and fro across the Isthmus and we should use it as a necessary and useful military and naval base. We could make an attractive and beautiful healthy park out of it there in the Tropics, while utilizing it for military and naval stores, for armament and equipment that would make us invincible and invulnerable upon either ocean in time of war.

And in periods of peace—and we hope they will be either frequent or lengthy—in times of peace and prosperity we should invite commerce, and we should make the tolls low enough not only to compete with the route around the Horn and the route through the Suez Canal, but also to enable us to compete with the transcontinental railroads, which so long obstructed and prevented the construction of that canal.

And I may say right here, as I said in the Fifty-fifth Congress, that these corporate influences operating against the construction of the canal were so powerful that if the Representatives who believe in the construction of the canal, as I do, had not been willing to vote for it solely as a military and naval measure the canal proposition would never have been commenced and no dirt would be flying at Panama. But we took a constitutional view of it, and we proceeded to pass that act in spite of the opposition of the corporations, and I hold to all the views to which I then held, not only that we have the right to make it an instrument of strength and power both for offense and defense for the United States, but I go further and agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] that it ought to be absolutely neutral. But I do not agree with him that we ought to go cringing and fauning and begging all the nations of the earth to come here and help us violate and repudiate the Monroe doctrine to help us in our administration of our rights and duties on the Western Continent by agreeing with us how to manage our affairs. [Applause.]

I propose, as I proposed in the beginning, Mr. Chairman, that by the might and power of the United States we should say to all the earth, as we promised England, that we will not only police this canal strip, we will not only protect it against ever being blockaded, but we will see that all the nations who observe the rules of this canal management shall pass through the canal on absolutely equal and fair terms, and we will attend to the job ourselves. No other nation is invited to interfere or take a hand in any respect.

All these questions of our right and duty to fortify and neutralize the canal on our own account and by our own power were thrashed out during the Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, and Fifty-seventh Congresses. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty contemplated a purely commercial canal, which Congress had no authority to construct. That treaty forbade a military canal, the only kind we were warranted to construct. I took the position that if we could not amend the Clayton-Bulwer treaty so as to conform to our purposes, we ought to denounce it to a final end and go on with our plans; but I assert the belief that by proper effort we could amend it. We tried and succeeded. We are now building a canal according to our own ideas and constitutional authority. In due time we will finish it. Then we will devote the canal and canal strip to the use of our Army and Navy, incidentally inviting commerce to pass through and deriving some financial return therefrom. We should fortify at both ends of the canal, placing all around both Panama and Limon Bays and in the islands within Panama Bay the most powerful batteries in the world, invincible and invulnerable, secured and protected in the best manner known to the art of war. We should mount guns with sufficient range, accuracy, and carrying capacity to command and clear the offing for miles out to sea, so that under their protection our Navy, emerging from either end of the canal, may be able to form in battle array before proceeding to take care of itself and destroy any hostile fleet.

The only standing order, always observed by our Navy, is understood to be "Either destroy or capture all the enemy's ships." If as predicted by some apprehensive gentlemen, airships becoming dangerous, threaten to fly over the fortifications and thereby annul their usefulness, some Yankee will soon invent a gun that will find their range and bring them down. Other nations can not object to our fortification plans. Certainly England can not until she dismantles Gibraltar and all her fortified positions off our eastern coast, stretching in long line from Labador to the southern seas. If those guns off our coast are not aimed at us nobody knows their purpose, yet we do not whine and complain of threatened and immediate hostility. Neither can any other nation complain that we fortify, making a military reservation of the strip in order to protect our property and protect all shipping, military and commercial, which we invite to pass through the canal, just as we are entitled to security in passing through Suez, whether protected by immediate physical power or by the imputed power and prestige which is known to exist, resting ultimately and fundamentally upon the power and prestige of British arms.

But, Mr. Chairman, every boy, I suppose, as soon as he begins to think about it, expects to get married some day, but he does not want to do that until he is grown and has learned how to get married. [Laughter.] He expects to occupy his house as soon as he builds it but he does not move in until it is ready. In every one of the last two or three Congresses I have had to resist premature efforts of gentlemen to legislate finally for the canal and the canal strip. I have always said, "Let us wait and build the canal first. Let us not allow any excitement or anything else to get us out of the track of proceeding to the work and finishing the canal."

When we have the canal ready to open for our own use, primarily, and secondarily for the use of the commerce of the world; when we know that we are going to be there permanently, and know what we are going to have there, and know how we are going to use it, and just what we can do and what is necessary to do, then let us provide permanent legislation for the operation of the canal and for the management and government of whatever the United States sees proper to encourage and use and keep on that canal strip. [Applause.] And let it all be done on our own motion and neutralized by our own invitation and power. If we should pursue any other course we would sacrifice our ascendency on this continent and justly lose the respect of the world. [Applause.] But this legislation at this time is premature. The end of material things is not coming with the death of this Congress. There will undoubtedly be other Congresses, and several of them, before the canal is finished. Some of us fear we will have an opportunity to begin legislation before we want it. It is not a very long time even to next December, even if a Republican President can refrain from the extraordinary act of calling together a Democratic Congress without promising to sign the bills that pass. If he should be illogical enough to convene a Democratic Congress prematurely, under the delusion that they will champion his measures, gratuitously, rashly, and ridiculously, or if he should be insincere enough to call a Democratic House together in extra session, without intending in good faith to approve the measures which he knows it is their duty to pass, and which he knows the people instructed that Congress to pass, we will welcome the call.

The people will hold him and his party responsible for his peculiar conduct. Unless he intends to approve the reform legislation the people have determined upon, he can depend upon it that his pet measures will receive the last and least attention. Nobody need become excited or get in a hurry about fortification or any other legislation about the regulation of the canal or the canal strip. Our business is now, and will be for several years to come, to try to finish that canal, and it requires an effort on our part to divest the subject of irrelevant questions and premature suggestion and action. There are no perceptible war clouds on the horizon. The people of no nations are lying awake of nights meditating assaults on us. Occasionally we hear an excitable lecture or speech, or read sensational articles in newspaper and magazines, but no reason yet appears to precipitate permanent legislation for the strip or for the fortification and management of the canal years in advance of its probable opening. When Culebra quits sliding, when that volcanic débris assumes its natural slope as does all dirt of whatever character, when the locks are finished and tried out and the dams are pronounced secure beyond peradventure, when we know what we are doing and are willing to risk our own battleships and invite the commerce of the world, we will surely have foreseen it long enough to have begun and completed preparations, not only for the protection of the canal and canal strip, but also for the permanent regulation and operation and government thereof. It is, however, entirely unnecessary to become hysterical and begin to hurry now about permanent legislation. If fortifications presented the only proposition at this time I might have afforded to refrain from these remarks, but in other bills and other places we have seen that efforts are being made to anticipate by present legislation everything that can ever become necessary to be done in connection with the canal under favorable circumstances and with verification of the hope of the most optimistic. Plans have been made and are being carried forward now to push all these measures through before this Congress dies a week from to-day, as if there were never to be another Congress, and may the good Lord vouchsafe to us that there may never be another Republican Congress. This is all premature. I have heard all the arguments in favor of it and all the reasons on which they are based. Accepting the assertions made in the premises, some of them appear plausible at first glance, but on examination and reflection the plausibility disappears. There is no sound reason to justify such legislation at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman there are two inquiries involved in the proposition to fortify the Panama Canal:—

First:—Is it competent for the United States to erect these fortifications, under the stipulations of existing treaties?

Second:—Conceding the right, should this right be exercised to the exclusion of any other policy?

A treaty of neutralization, concluded between this country, and the great powers of the world, would be in harmony with the spirit and policy that directed all the negotiations which preceded the formal beginning of that mighty work at Panama, which is destined to change the trade relations, and I might almost say, the destinies of the world. Such a treaty would protect the canal in the most effective manner, without burden or expense to this country, without any impingement upon our national interests, and without derogation of our national dignity, and self-respect. It is a recent discovery of the jingo spirit, that national honor and self-respect, are involved in the construction of great military works, and the maintenance of a costly military force on the Isthmus. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, expressly provides, that the contracting parties shall guarantee the neutrality of a canal through Central America, and that neither "will ever erect, or maintain, any fortifications commanding the canal, or the vicinity thereof."

In the course of the debate it has been suggested, that in some mysterious way, the Monroe doctrine is involved in the fortification of the canal by this Government, and that any effort to neutralize it through a treaty with the European, and other countries, would be a violation of this doctrine. This attitude merely illustrates the straits to which the advocates of fortification are driven, to provide arguments in support of their position. The Monroe doctrine was to the front in a far more acute form, during the long period preceding the Civil War, than it has been at any time in the last 40 years. Yet the statesmen and Presidents of that time, never apprehended that the maintenance of this doctrine was inconsistent with the neutralization of an interoceanic canal through international agreement. In 1826 President Adams declared in his instructions to the American representatives to a Panama congress, that if an interoceanic canal should be executed so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation, or reasonable tolls. In 1835 the Senate of the United States adopted a resolution requesting President Jackson to undertake negotiations with the Governments of Central America, and New Granada (now Colombia), to effectually protect by appropriate treaties, such individuals, or companies, as might desire to establish communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus, and to insure, forever, by the stipulations of these treaties, the free and equal right to navigate such canal, to all nations, on the payment of reasonable tolls. A like resolution was adopted in 1839, by the House of Representatives, which concluded as follows: "For the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic, and Pacific Oceans, by the construction of an isthmian canal, and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal rights of navigating such canal, to all nations."

In 1846, the United States negotiated a treaty with New Granada, (now Colombia) by which the former power guaranteed the perfect neutrality of the Isthmus "with the view that the free transit from the one, to the other sea, shall not be interrupted or embarrassed, at any future time."

It may be objected that the parties to these negotiations are all nations of the Western Hemisphere. True, but go with me a step further. A little later, to be precise, in December 1849, an effort was made on the part of President Taylor, through his Secretary of State, to induce England to effect a treaty with Colombia, then New Granada, by which the former would guarantee the neutrality of the Isthmus. At the same time, the American minister to Colombia was directed to urge upon that country, the wisdom of making such a treaty with Great Britain. So far from holding that participation of the European powers in the neutralization of the canal, would be an infraction of the Monroe doctrine, President Buchanan welcomed the co-operation of these powers. The following extract is taken from the President's reply to a communication from Great Britain, suggesting a treaty between Great Britain, France, and the United States, to secure the freedom and neutralization of the transit route over the Isthmus of Panama:

The President fully appreciates the importance of that route, to the commercial nations of the world, and the great advantage that must result from its entire security, both in peace, and in war, but he does not perceive that any new guaranty is necessary for this purpose, on the part of the United States. By the treaty concluded with New Granada on the 12th, of December 1846, to which your lordship has referred, this Government guaranteed the neutrality of the Isthmus, and also the rights of sovereignty, and property over it, of New Granada.

A similar measure on the part of England and France, would give additional security to the transit, and would be regarded favorably, therefore, by this Government. But any participation by the United States, in such a measure, is rendered unnecessary, by the arrangements already referred to. The President hopes that by general consent of the maritime powers, the interoceanic lines, with the harbors of immediate approach, may be secured beyond interruption, to the great purpose for which they were established.

This invitation to England and France, to supplement by independent action, the undertaking into which this Government had entered to neutralize any interoceanic line of transportation, followed the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, which was ratified by the Senate on March 22, of that year. It may be almost said, that this treaty was the outcome of President Taylor's message of December 1849, in which he insisted that an isthmian canal should be constructed under the common protection of all nations, for the equal benefit of all. But whether it is true that this message was the parent of the negotiations that culminated in the treaty, it is none the less true, that this treaty was in harmony with the established attitude of this country, that any canal across the Isthmus, should be effectually neutralized, and open to the ships of all countries. There was no war-breathing jingo of that day, to oppose the co-operation of Great Britain in guaranteeing the neutralization of the canal, on the ground that such co-operation would be an interference with the Monroe doctrine. At least if such a jingo existed, he did not make his protest effectual.

President Pierce, in his message of 1854 actually insisted that an effort should be made to make the "doctrine of neutralization a principle of international law, by means of special conventions between the several powers of Europe, and America."

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty is too elaborate a document for reproduction in its entirety, but a few pregnant citations will be afforded. In Article I, it is declared, among other things, that:—"The Governments of the United States, and Great Britain, hereby declare, that neither the one, or the other, will ever obtain, or maintain for itself, any exclusive control over said ship canal, agreeing that neither will ever erect, or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof." Later, it is declared in Article V, that the signatory powers "will protect the completed canal from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and guarantee its neutrality, so that the said canal may be forever free and open." The parties to this guaranty were amply able to make it good, and a canal constructed under the protection of this treaty would have been neutralized forever and a day, without a fort, or a garrison along its route, or any increase of the national burdens of the contracting parties. By the express provisions of the treaty, the canal was to be open on like terms to the citizens, and subjects, of every other State. The gentlemen who oppose neutralization by the powers, on the ground that it is in conflict with the Monroe doctrine, will find little support for this view, in the attitude expressed in Article VIII, of the foregoing treaty. Without reservation, the contracting parties engage, in that article, to invite every other State, with which either, or both, have friendly intercourse, to enter into stipulations with them, similar to those which they have entered into with each other, and in Article VIII it is provided that the canal shall be open on like terms, to the citizens, and subjects, of every other State.

The Monroe doctrine is difficult of exact definition, but certainly it has never been hitherto invoked, to prohibit the powers of the world from participating in a great scheme of peace, through the effective neutralization of an international highway. We impeach the wisdom and foresight of our forefathers, if not their patriotism, by the suggestion that the Monroe doctrine forbids any effort to neutralize the canal by international convention. It is passing strange that in the voluminous correspondence, public documents, and official communications, relating to this subject, no trace is found of any lurking belief, on the part of anyone concerned with forwarding this great project, that the cooperation of foreign countries with this Government, to preserve the canal from every form of hostile interruption, was an impingement upon a principle so fundamental, and respected, as the Monroe doctrine. Such a suggestion is not well taken. The Monroe doctrine was neither assailed, nor weakened, when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty stipulated the neutrality of the canal. The Monroe doctrine is a principle of peace. So is the principle of neutralization. They are in harmony, not in conflict. Why not welcome every aid that will tend to keep inviolate from the profaning hands of hostile attack, the mighty work which we will hold, in its completed form, as a trustee for the world? If the world is to participate on equal terms in the benefits of this enterprise, why may not the nations of the world act in concert to preserve its integrity, and thus relieve this country from a burden, which we may be able to carry, but which we would willingly put aside, if such action may be taken without prejudice to material interests, loss of national power, or standing in international councils? The former attitude of this country, and the facts of the case, alike repel the contention, that the principles of the Monroe doctrine forbid the neutralization of the Panama Canal, through international compact.

The United States could neither build, nor acquire supreme control of this canal, under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Hence, when it was decided that this enterprise should take a national form, it was necessary to negotiate another convention. This was done under the auspices of President McKinley, and is known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. This treaty specially provides for neutralization, adopting in substance the rules of neutralization found in the rules of 1888, relating to the Suez Canal, and declaring that the canal shall be free and open, in time of war, as in peace, to the vessels of commerce, and of war, of all nations, on terms of entire equality. In one of the later provisions, it is provided that, "no fortifications shall ever be erected, commanding the canal, or the adjacent waters." This treaty was ratified by this country in 1900, a little over 10 years ago, when our jingoes had not learned, that mighty fortifications, and a great army at Panama, were vital to the defense of this country. If it is suggested, that this provision against fortifications, escaped the attention of the Senate, such a suggestion is repelled by the facts of record. An amendment to strike out this clause was offered in the Senate, and rejected by a large majority. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1900 was approved by the Senate, but rejected by Great Britain. A rejection on our part might have been properly related to the clause against fortifications. But the action of Great Britain can not be explained on this ground. In 1901, a subsequent Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated under the direction of President Roosevelt, and approved both by this country, and England. If the right to fortify the canal is claimed under the latter treaty, that claim should be supported by a clear and explicit declaration. No ambiguous reference would be sufficient to support a claim which the United States had been willing to forego in its entirety, within the previous year. For the purposes of intelligent discussion, the text of the present treaty, omitting the formal preliminaries, and conclusion, is herewith reproduced:

ARTICLE I. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ART. II. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to, or purchase of, stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have, and enjoy, all the rights incident to such construction, as well as exclusive right of providing for the regulation, and management of the canal.

ART. III. The United States adopts as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal—that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce, and of war, of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect to the conditions, or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions, and charges of traffic, shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary, and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ART. IV. It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that when New Granada undertook to sound some of the European powers as to the guaranteeing of the neutrality of the proposed canal, that America said to her then that she would consider such intervention on the part of foreign powers as an unfriendly act?

Mr. SAUNDERS. On the contrary the Government of the United States through its minister to Colombia directed the Government of Colombia to take up with Great Britain and negotiate with her, a treaty by which the latter country should guarantee the neutrality of the then contemplated canal. Those are the facts of history. Now I wish to say another thing in this connection. It is asserted that we should not call in the aid of the world to neutralize this canal. Who then shall neutralize it? The Government of the United States? In all history did a country ever undertake to say that it should be neutral, and its property neutralized? Neutralization, as a matter of necessity, contemplates the cooperation of others, and when we declared in the Hay treaty in favor of the great principle of neutralization, and that is the one thing that is thrust to the front in that treaty, we announced a principle, and assumed an attitude, which committed us to invite the cooperation of others to make effective the neutralization of the canal. A few days since President Taft announced that it is the exclusive duty of the United States to preserve the neutrality of the canal.

I would like to ask one question, and perhaps the gentleman from Kentucky, who has just risen, can answer it, in connection with the question he proposes to ask. My question is this: Where do we find in the Hay treaty, and I now have it before me, any clause which says that it shall be the sole duty of the United States to neutralize the Panama Canal.

Mr. SHERLEY. Without reading the treaty, I can not answer the gentleman categorically.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I invite any gentleman on this floor to point out the clause of that treaty which says it shall be the duty of the United States singly, and alone, to neutralize the Panama Canal.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is the gentleman aware that President Arthur, in a message to Congress, September 6, 1881, declared—

This Government learned that Colombia had proposed to European powers to join in the guaranty of the neutrality of the proposed Panama Canal, a guaranty which would be in direct contravention of our obligation as the sole guarantors—

And so forth——

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am well aware of that.

Mr. SHERLEY. And then goes on to state that his predecessor——

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am perfectly well aware of that.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman denied it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, I did not. The Monroe doctrine was more to the front before the Civil War, as a burning question so to say, that it has been since that time, and yet during President Taylor's administration the minister of this country to Granada was directed by the President to urge upon that country the propriety of negotiating a treaty with England by which the latter was to neutralize the canal in aid of the neutralization of the United States Government.

Mr. GARRETT. When was that? if I may ask the gentleman.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will give the gentleman the date in a few moments. There is no question that this was done.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Does the gentleman differentiate that statement, from the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No. I do not. Both statements are true, and recite the actual occurrences. They present two opposing attitudes. President Taylor's attitude represented the attitude of our country when, as I have said, the Monroe doctrine was far more to the front in public discussion than it is to-day. Now, I wish to call the attention of this House to another proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman explain why Article III of the treaty adopted says that "the United States adopts, as a basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules," whereas the treaty that was not ratified had it that the high contracting parties were to adopt.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The language used merely emphasizes the extent to which this country was willing to go in adopting the principle of neutralization. As England was a party to the Suez pact, it was not necessary to say that she was consenting to an application of the Suez rules to Panama. It is splitting hairs, it seems to me, to undertake to say that the provision cited shall be construed in such a way as to announce that the obligations of the high contracting parties under section 4, does not include an obligation of Great Britain to guarantee on its part the neutrality of the canal.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. If the right to fortify is conceded, I want to ask the gentleman if that does not carry with it the right to blockade the canal, and consequently is a violation of the treaty.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly. If the right to fortify is conceded, then by the exercise of that right the United States can establish that very blockade which the treaty forbids.

If we have the right of blockade, if we have the right to maintain armies, if we have the right to establish bristling fortifications on the canal, without any authority to that effect afforded by the terms of the treaty, why was it necessary for the treaty to give this country in explicit terms the authority to maintain military police to protect the canal against lawlessness. This inferior right would be included, as a matter of course, in the other and larger power.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. He must bear in mind that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty made certain obligations on both England and America, and expressly denied to America certain rights that ordinarily she would possess.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I understand that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, in order that there may be no doubt as to her abusing those rights when it adopted the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, setting out the powers that belonged——

Mr. SAUNDERS. If all that is true, I would like to make this comment: This treaty does not require England to do anything save to be bound by the obligations which she incurred as a high contracting party. What were, and are these obligations, if the duty of guaranteeing neutrality at Panama, is not one of them? Our rights and duties are determined by this treaty. We should live up to them, like an individual to his contract.

Mr. CLINE. The President of the United States in his speech in New York on the night of the 21st of January did not rest the right to fortify on our sovereignty. He said we secured that right out of a nullification of the Bulwer treaty and the Spooner Act of 1902.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Let me refer to the Spooner Act. That was an act of this Government, and by no principle of interpretation with which I am acquainted, can the act of one party to a contract, be held to be the interpretation of the instrument, in the sense that it has ascertained the rights, and presented the views of both. Never has that been ascertained to be true. So that when you suggest the Spooner Act as an interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty I ask you by virtue of what authority was the Spooner Act passed? We must look to the treaty itself, to determine our rights, and the authority of the Government to pass the Spooner Act.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does he not think it strange that so many gentlemen upon this floor now voted for the Spooner Act, which expressly provided that the President is authorized to enter into such contract as may be deemed necessary for the proper excavation, construction, and completion of the defense of such canal?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No. Just as I will not be surprised to see the fortification of the canal ordered, though it is in violation of the terms of this treaty.

Mr. SHERLEY. If that act was in violation of that treaty——

Mr. SAUNDERS. How in the name of high heaven can the individual act of one contracting party, supersede the obligation of a joint instrument?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can simply answer you by saying that this Government has on several occasions terminated a treaty by act of Congress, and the Supreme Court has recognized the validity of such action.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I recognize, of course, that if the United States Government wishes to break a treaty, there is nothing that restrains her except force, but surely no one will advance the argument that because we have the force to do that which is wrong, that therefore the force with which a thing is done, makes the act right.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not agree with the gentleman's assumption that it is a violation of the treaty, but if it was it would supersede the treaty.

Mr. SAUNDERS. You are suggesting that this act indicated that we proposed to terminate that treaty.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I have not suggested it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What is your suggestion, then?

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply said that, taking your assumption, the effect of it was to abrogate the treaty.

Mr. SAUNDERS. On the contrary, I simply said it might indicate our purpose to abrogate it. It was passed without regard to the binding effect of the treaty, but it could never abrogate it, unless the United States clearly indicated that it did not intend to be bound by the terms of its own solemn compact.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. I yield more time to the gentleman.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I wish to say in conclusion, that I shall vote to oppose the fortification of the canal, because I believe that it is contrary to our treaty stipulations. I shall oppose and vote against the fortification of the canal, because in the contemplation of the gentlemen who know the war game, gentlemen like Admiral Evans and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio who has spoken on this subject, and many others, the effect of these fortifications will be to weaken, and not strengthen, our line of defense.

I shall vote against the proposition to fortify the Panama Canal, because if after our professions of peace, we really favor peace, the mightiest contribution that we could make to the peace of the world, will be the neutralization of this great international highway.

The most casual examination of this treaty, will reveal that it does not contemplate that the canal shall be an exclusive possession of the United States, in time of war. The chief purpose of this pact, was not to change the attitude of the contracting parties, toward the great principles of neutralization, and universal use, but to enable the Government of the United States to construct an isthmian canal, if desired, at its own cost, and to afford this country, subject to the provisions, and limitations of the treaty, the exclusive right of "providing for the regulation, and management of the same." It is expressly provided that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce, and of war, of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality. It is further provided that the canal shall never be blockaded. Mighty fortresses erected by this country, commanding and controlling the approaches and use of the canal, will constitute a blockade, whenever they are utilized to exclude the ships of another nation in time of war. The chief argument of the gentlemen who insist upon fortifying this highway is, that we will need it in time of war, for the transfer of our war vessels from one ocean, to another. But suppose our antagonists desire to use it for the same purpose? Will it be competent for this Nation to exclude them, under authority of this treaty, and if it does exclude them by its forts, and military garrisons, will not such act bc that blockade which is forbidden by Article II?

If it was not intended that the canal should be used by Great Britain, in the event of war with this country, and such a war is as likely as any that is suggested, what does the treaty mean when it declares that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of war, of all nations observing the rules of neutralization, that the same shall never be blockaded, nor any right of war, or act of hostility, exercised within it, and that vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual, or take any stores in the canal, except so far as may be strictly necessary? These rights would be enjoyed by the nations of the world, whether or not they became parties to this international agreement designed to preserve and secure them. Thus they possess the present right of free use of the canal, without any obligation to preserve the property. The United States is not a party to the Suez pact, but during the War with Spain, we were informed that the use of that canal was open to us, in the event we desired to send our warships to the Orient by that route. But if the nations of the world will enjoy the right to use the Isthmian Canal, why not emphasize the value of that right, by inviting their cooperation to preserve the integrity of the same in perpetuity? Surely no one will seriously contend, that the right to build frowning fortresses, and maintain great armies on the route of the canal, will be found in the section which provides that the United States shall be at liberty to maintain such military police, along the canal, as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness, and disorder? These words convey an obvious meaning, and refer to the ordinary conditions likely to exist on a work of this character, in a country subject to periodic disorders. No one would include a standing army, or fortifications of such extensive character that the prime cost will run into the millions, under the head of military police. It will be noted that the language of the act is most specific and emphatic, when a sweeping right is intended to be conveyed.

Article II, provides that the United States "shall have, and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation, and management of the canal." This confers a right, as it should be conferred, clearly and unambiguously. If it was intended that this treaty should confer upon this Government, the right heretofore expressly denied, namely, to erect and maintain fortifications commanding the canal, and the waters adjacent thereto, we would expect to find this authority granted in explicit and unambiguous terms, and not lying perdu in a clause authorizing the use of military police to preserve the canal against lawlessness, and disorder. These are not apt words to describe a state of war, or to convey authority to prepare against the same, by the construction of vast forts, and the establishment and maintenance of a strong army, on the route of the canal. President Taft in a recent address on this subject, declares that the Hay treaty shows, not only that the canal was to be built, owned, and operated by the United States, but that the neutrality of the canal should be maintained by the United States, and that nothing in the treaty would prevent the United States from fortifying the canal, or closing the same, to the shipping of the enemy. In sole support of this proposition he cites, not the treaty itself, but the Spooner Act of 1902, directing the President to build the canal, and make proper defenses. But this act was our own, and not a joint act. Hence it can not be considered an authoritative interpretation of a treaty, which, of necessity is a joint instrument. Again, the President insists that the right to fortify the canal, and close it to the shipping of an enemy, must have been insisted upon by the Senate. But the Senate did nothing of the sort. On the contrary that body ratified a measure, in the first instance, which expressly excluded the United States from the exercise of this right, and by an overwhelming majority, voted down an amendment designed to strike out the provision forbidding fortifications.

The President is further in error, in suggesting that under the treaty with England, it is this country which guarantees the neutrality of the canal, thus excluding, even England, the other high contracting party, from participation in the guaranty. Article IV, clearly imposes this obligation upon both contracting parties. If this is not intended, what does this article mean, when it provides that "no change of territorial sovereignty, or of the international relations of the country, or countries traversed by the canal, shall affect the general principle of neutralization, or the obligation of the high contracting parties, under the present treaty." In what portion of the instrument do we find the provision, either in terms, or by necessary implication, that the neutrality of the canal shall be exclusively guaranteed by the United States? The treaty confers only one exclusive right upon this country, the right to provide for the regulation, and management of the canal. What are the obligations imposed upon the high contracting parties to this convention, if the obligation to preserve the neutrality of the canal, is not one of them? Evidently, Article IV contemplates that there will be certain obligations of a joint character imposed by the treaty, else its language is meaningless, and largely superfluous. Among these obligations, whatever they may be, what obligation is so obvious and paramount, as the obligation to preserve the neutrality of the highway proposed, in order that its benefits may be secured, not oaly to the contracting parties, but to the other nations which are included within its terms? Our rights upon the Isthmus are treaty rights, measured and determined, by those treaties. Under what view of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty will this Government undertake to exclude the vessels of Great Britain, in time of war with that country, and at the same time keep its faith, and carry out our undertaking, that the canal shall be free at all times, to the vessels of war, of all nations, and that the same shall never be blockaded, nor any right of war, or act of hostility, be committed within it?

The exclusion of the war vessels of Great Britain from the free use of the canal in time of war, will in itself constitute the very blockade against which we have undertaken to provide, and which we have guaranteed shall not occur. Garrisons and armies in the zone, intended to make this blockade effective, will merely serve to emphasize our breach of faith, and the worthlessness of our guaranty. Our national honor is touched in this suggestion. It is no longer a question of what the terms of the compact should be. We are concerned merely with the ascertainment of the provisions of the existing compact, and with the maintenance of good faith, in our relations to the other contracting party.

The President asserts further, that he would be "glad to have all the powers come in, and consent to the neutrality of the canal, as a treaty obligation," but expresses the fear that even then, a possible injury might be done to the canal by some irresponsible belligerent. Such a fear is most remote. If the great powers of the world unite to protect the canal, and add their sanction to the joint undertaking of this country, and Great Britain, there is no responsible, much less irresponsible belligerent, who would dare to commit one act of mischief along the entire course of the canal, and thus challenge the irresistible combination committed to its protection. Such a course on the part of any responsible nation is unthinkable. This Government will be able to deal with irresponsible persons under the police power which is fully accorded to it, by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Some opponents of neutralization insist that there is no analogy in the neutralization of the Suez Canal, resting this contention on the ground that the land through which the Suez Canal runs, is not within the jurisdiction of England, or of any of the five great powers.

But this objection does not go to the principle of neutralization, which is always secured by treaty compacts, and mutual agreements. The Suez Canal was neutralized with the consent of the power which exercises jurisdiction over the territory through which it runs. Conceding that we possess titular sovereignty over the zone, and are fully competent to enforce our authority, and preserve our property, these facts would give a flattering character to our invitation to the powers to unite with us in neutralizing the canal. Such an invitation would be an earnest of our desire for universal peace, and evince our readiness to work to that end, in disregard of the suggestions of a false pride, that we carry a great burden alone, merely because the enterprise is on our territory. This fact presents no hindrance to the enactment of a sufficient treaty of neutralization. The suggestion of ownership, is merely intended to quicken a feeling of vanity on our part, and is fully as mischievous as the contention that our right to erect fortifications at Panama, is upon the same footing as our right to fortify the harbor of New York, or Pearl Harbor in the Hawaiian Islands. If the latter contention be true, the question may well be asked: Why was it necessary to negotiate a further treaty with Great Britain, before proceeding with the enterprise? If the zone is our soil in the same sense as Hawaii, then any treaty stipulations with any European country, preliminary to the construction of a canal, were a superfluity. But the analogy of New York, or Pearl Harbor, does not hold good. Our rights at Panama, so far as they relate to the canal, as well as our obligations, are largely treaty rights, and the terms of the treaties must determine the extent, and character of these rights. Not only is there no loss of national dignity, in an invitation to the nations to join with us in a compelling treaty of neutralization, but this action on our part would give incomparable impetus to the movement for universal peace. Such a treaty would surround the gigantic work at Panama, with the benefits of a world-compelling sanction.

Think of such a consummation, secured without money, and without price. Extend to the great powers an invitation to aid us in this practical fashion, to secure the canal against the possibilities of harm, and immediately there will ensue a universal realization, that after all, the blessings of peace, which are now sought through the costly way of military preparations, may be secured by the preferable way of mutual compact, thus avoiding not only war, but war's alarms. It is the disposition to stand on national dignity, when that dignity is not involved; it is the willingness to hearken to the suggestions of a false pride, which hinders the progress of universal peace. On all hands it is admitted that international cooperation will afford a permanent and effective neutralization of the canal, but pride whispers in our ear that we should reject neutralization without cost, in favor of a policy that will afford less positive and definite results, though involving the expenditure of millions that could be utilized in far more helpful enterprises of national progress and uplift. Away with this costly and burdensome alternative, product of a diseased vanity. Sink deeper than ever plummet sounded the suggestion that we will lose dignity, prestige, or standing, by neutralizing the canal through the friendly cooperation of the other powers. As well contend that no friendly compact of practical neutralization should have been arranged with Great Britain, for the Great Lakes, but that we ought to protect our side of the line against hostile incursions, by bristling fortifications at every lake port, and frowning fortresses crowning every eminence on the long frontier between Canada and this country. I am unable to perceive that the Hay treaty affords this country the authority necessary to construct fortifications at the terminals, and along the course of the canal, and thereby arrange to make effectual a blockade which, in terms, the treaty forbids.

But conceding that we possess this right, a wise policy indicates that it should be waived in favor of neutralization. Unless we abrogate the Hay treaty, and repudiate the terms upon which the compact was secured, this country enjoys no exclusive right to the use of the canal, even in time of war. I freely agree that the United States is financially able to establish, and maintain any fortifications that the military experts may recommend. Our resources are practically inexhaustible, but this fact furnishes no reason why we should enter upon a scheme of fantastic and useless expenditures. Men who know the war game, men like Admiral Evans, and Gen. KEIFER, and many others, are agreed that fortifications at Panama will weaken our line of defense. Unless the garrisons are maintained on a war footing, they will be captured before relief arrives, in the event of an unexpected declaration of war. If they are continuously maintained on such a footing, the prime cost of the fortifications, added to this cost of maintenance, may well give us pause. It is the opinion of competent military men that the physical character and climatic conditions of the country of the zone, are such that terminal fortifications will defend the canal to little purpose against expeditionary forces landed in time of war and operating from the adjacent territory. The ends of the canal are well out in either ocean, so that a hostile fleet lying beyond the range of the forts, could attack our fleet as it emerged from the canal, and before it could form in line of battle. Hence in the result, it is our fleet that will protect the canal, and hinder the landing of expeditionary forces. Two ex-Secretaries of this Government, have declared against this scheme of fortification. Ex-Secretary of State Olney challenges the assertion, that the Hay treaty confers upon this country the right to fortify the canal, and propounds the trenchant inquiry: If the United States meant to secure in the Hay treaty, and Great Britain intended to concede, the absolute ownership, and control of the canal, with the consequent right to fortify the same, what was the occasion, or the reason, for this country to ask, and Great Britain to concede, the right to police the canal? True. The right to fortify and blockade, would include the lesser right to police the zone against lawlessness and disorder.

In a real sense, the United States is a trustee of this international highway, under the treaty stipulations. Hence the significance of the provision that it shall have the police authority necessary to protect the canal, and its works, against sporadic lawlessness. This authority properly attaches to such ownership and control as are provided for in the treaty. But the larger duty to afford complete protection against hostile attack, is a joint obligation, lodged in the two contracting parties. Ex-Secretary of the Navy, John D. Long, holds that a naval force at either end of the canal, with a moderate garrison on shore, will be ample force to protect the canal against irresponsible depredators. In his opinion, extensive fortifications are unnecessary. But I will not undertake to discuss the military and strategic features of the proposition to establish formidable batteries, and maintain an extensive army at Panama. Fortunately this phase, as all other phases, for that matter, of this situation has been exhaustively discussed by the Member from Ohio, Gen. KEIFER, who brings the knowledge of a soldier, with the prescience of a statesman, to the elucidation of this problem. The admirable speech which he has printed in the RECORD, is a mine of information for all who seek light on this subject, and it will remain a monumental contribution to the debate on this great question. The arguments on military grounds, which he advances against the proposition to fortify the canal, are of so cogent and convincing a character, that I reproduce them in full in this connection:

> Barring all questions of the policy of neutralization of the Panama Canal, in the interest of and for the promotion of commerce, and universal peace among the nations, and putting aside all treaty obligations to neutralize it, or the Canal Zone, and regarding the canal only as to its value in time of war to which the United States is a party, and for strategic reasons alone, I believe that it is easy of demonstration that the United States should have its neutrality guaranteed by an international treaty, similar in terms and character to the Suez Canal treaty—1888—now in effect, embodied in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.
> If this Government was at war with a great maritime nation possessed of a superior army and navy, and otherwise strong enough to wage successfully an offensive war distant from its own shores, it would be a fearful misfortune to our country to have to maintain an army on the line of the Panama Canal and a navy in the waters of both oceans at its ends sufficiently strong to protect it from seizure and destruction.
> If such a belligerent nation had a navy or fleet which we could whip on the sea with our Navy, we could find it in either ocean and destroy it. If it had one with which our Navy could not cope, then the enemy could soon blockade the canal and starve out and capture whatever army and navy, unless very large, we were unfortunate enough to have in the fortifications and at the terminals of the canal. Such a belligerent, with such a fleet, could soon, if necessary, pass around the Horn or through the—neutralized—Straits of Magellan, as did Capt. Clark with the Oregon during the late War with Spain in 1898; and the more, in such case, of our Army and war vessels we had stationed to protect the Panama Canal the weaker we would be for offensive or defensive work at more important places. If we should be at war with a weak naval power, a fortified canal would be of no possible strategic importance to us; and so if at war with a superior naval power the canal would not only be of no strategic importance, but a positive source of weakness to us.

If open, neutralized, never blockaded, and not fortified, as guaranteed by existing treaties, and the ships of war of a nation with which we were at war could pass through the canal unmolested, they would not do so until a base for coal, ammunition, and other absolutely necessary supplies were first established. Such a base would be impossible to find on the Atlantic or Pacific shores.

A war fleet on the ocean without an established base of supplies, unless near enough to its home base to keep up quick, certain, and regular communication by transports, would need no adverse fleet to destroy it. Such a fleet thus situated would be even worse off than an army on land campaigning without a base of supplies for food, forage, and ammunition in a country where they could not be found. Imagine Cervera's Spanish fleet leaving Spain in 1898 for America without a friendly harbor in which to take refuge and receive coal and other supplies. We heard much of Admiral Schley's troubles about not blockading Cervera's fleet for want of suitable or ample coal barges from which to coal the American Fleet.

Before our splendid Atlantic Fleet—16 ships—could start—1907—around the world we had to arrange for coal at foreign ports, and we expended for coal alone used on its voyage $2,984,900.41, at an extra cost of $1,619,843.32, the total expense of the entire voyage being $13,460,512.

The most serious objection to fortifying the Panama Canal, aside from the impracticability of it, is the fact that, in peace as well as war, the United States would have to keep an army and navy of substantial size and strength on the line and in the waters at the termini of the canal to defend it from attack should war suddenly break out. The example may be cited of Japan—February, 1904—seizing the harbors at Port Arthur and Chemulpo and capturing or destroying all the Russian vessels at Chemulpo, and capturing, destroying, or closely blockading Russia's warships and her best army, 25,000 effectives, then stationed at Port Arthur. Had these places been neutralized, or even abandoned, the Russian war vessels then in the Orient could have been in combined fleet at Vladivostok, or other place of comparative safety, from whence it could have operated effectively. As it was, the Russian naval power in the East was substantially destroyed or rendered inefficient the opening day of the war. And the subsequent attempt to hold and protect Port Arthur by Stoessel's Russian Army was equally unfortunate and fatal to success. The Russian strategists and critics, with those of other countries concurring, will never cease to attribute Russia's defeat to the mistake of trying to hold Port Arthur. They believe that if Stoessel's army could have been in concentration with the other Russian forces at the Yalu the Japanese never could have crossed it, and that the war would speedily have come to an end without the humiliation of Russia; that there would have been no destruction—1905—of the Russian fleet under Rojestvensky in the Japan Sea.

The sequel shows the supreme folly of the Russian's persistence, with one of its best armies and a remnant of its warships, in trying to hold Port Arthur until its other armies were beaten on several fields, and then finally losing Port Arthur and Stoessel's army with it in time for the Japanese army (Noga's) that captured it to join and take part in the final overthrow of the Russian main army at Mukden. And Russia's divided navy was annihilated as a natural consequence of such bad strategy.

In case our country should be at war our Army and Navy, to be effective, should be in concentration for offensive or defensive purposes against the enemy wherever he could be found—not engaged protecting a piece of property, however valuable.

Circumstances might possibly arise when, without fortifications, our Navy might be called on to protect the canal at the entrances or in the open sea, but then it would have the aid and cooperation of the powers which join in guaranteeing its neutralization.

With a large Army and Navy the canal might, at great peril elsewhere to the United States when engaged in war, be protected by the United States alone, but during such time no commerce could pass through it and no revenue would be derived from it, as a single warship of the enemy on either ocean could capture or prevent the entry or safe exit of any ships laden with commerce. Only batteries on high places near the entrances could blockade or defend the canal from injury by belligerent battleships. Possibly, only they could be erected and made available on one or more of the islands owned by the United States near its Pacific entrance. Battleships to protect the entrance would have to lay a good distance at sea, otherwise, at an inside-made harbor, from whence they could only move out one at a time, they could be shut in by an outside inferior fleet, aided, if necessary, by batteries on islands or the mainland not owned by the United States. Fortifications could be erected by an enemy on such islands or the mainland to command the channel entrances of the canal.

Indeed, the 5 miles limit of the Canal Zone on either side of the canal is, in this day of guns capable of accurately throwing shot 9 or more miles, far from being protective of it from batteries located on foreign territory. The Gatun, Pedro Miguel, and Miraflores locks could easily be put out of commission by guns located on heights not in the Canal Zone should the business of fortifying be entered upon. Panama, neither by its own—1903—nor by the New Granada treaty, is expressly forbidden to fortify on the line or adjacent shores of the canal; and judging by the past and present disturbed Central American conditions there is always danger of Panama becoming or being under the sovereignty of a country unfriendly to the United States.

All these dangers will be overcome by international neutralization and by the United States abiding strictly by the treaties. Authorized police regulations will amply protect the canal from the lawless and preserve order, and grim batteries on the shores at the entrances to it and at intervals along its line, with the most modern guns and armed men within them, will not dispense with such policing.

No ship would enter the canal to destroy it, even of a nation with which the United States was at war. Its own safety would be of first importance, and a nation would not desire to bring down upon it the guaranteeing powers while already engaged in war.

If a ship of any description entered the canal, pretending to acquiesce in its neutralization, but to do mischief, a thing hardly conceivable, it would not be entitled to protection if its purpose was discovered. Fortifications, however great, would not prevent a secret attempt by a ship or lawless band to injure the canal.

It has been suggested that a ship flying a flag of some country without right might enter the canal to dynamite its locks. This would mean its own destruction, and fortifications would be no protection against such, or like, deception. Again, I repeat, that only a ship of some nation has rights to be respected, and neutralization does not secure any rights save to those acting peaceably and in good faith. Guns need not be placed to fire on ships in the canal or in its locks.

All such dangers are, however, provided against, as the treaties expressly authorize the United States to "maintain such military force along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against the lawless."

Fortifications, batteries of great guns, at the entrances and on the line of the canal will be wholly useless for any purpose of its defense except to blockade it. Battleships will never enter it to attack or destroy it. They would be helpless there, unable to maneuver. They could not reach or injure the dams forming the lakes, and the destruction of the lakes or locks would be their own destruction. They will only enter to pass peaceably through the canal. So of all belligerent vessels. Fortifications can therefore only be of use to blockade the canal and could be otherwise of no practical use. Neutralization extends 3 marine miles beyond the canal ends, consequently a hostile fleet could not come within that limit without violating the treaties.

Admiral George Dewey, who is possessed of great knowledge and much experience, whose great success at Manila, May 1, 1898, resulted practically in overthrowing and destroying the Spanish fleet the first day of the Spanish War, when asked to approve the proposed fortifications and armament on the Panama Canal, is reported to have said:

"Fortifications? Why, of course not. As I understand it the canal is to be and should be a neutral commercial pathway between the two great oceans. To fortify it would simply result in making it a battle ground in case of war. Fortifications would be enormously expensive and ought not to be erected."

This summary of Admiral Dewey states well the extreme danger in time of war of having to employ forces in distant parts to protect property. The scattered fleets of Spain, when war came in 1898, afforded another striking example of bad strategy.

The fact that Spain tried to defend the far-off Philippines resulted in the same prompt discomfiture that befell Russia at the opening of the war with Japan.

Unless large forces, both Army and Navy, were constantly maintained on and adjacent to the Panama Canal, however fortified, a similar disaster would, if war came, most likely befall the United States.

To thus maintain an army and navy would be at great annual cost of treasure and of life. It would require the material increase of both our Army and Navy, now generally regarded as too small.

The report of the Panama fortification board, January 4, 1911, unless carefully examined, might be misleading as to the necessary cost of fortifications, though not as to their purpose. Their principal purpose is clearly stated to be the blockade of the canal against all comers; they are, in large part, described as "seacoast defenses for the termini of the canal * * * seacoast fortifications." The report also recommends naval stations and their equipment, including dry docks, searchlights, fire control, and so forth, at the termini, and whatever else is incident thereto.

It may be said that such war preparations do not mean blockade only as necessity arises; that there might be neutralization still. Their erection will be an act of war forbidden by all treaties, and they mean blockade of the canal, likewise forbidden, in war or peace, by the treaties.

The preliminary initial estimate in the board's report, as originally made, was $19,546,843, but it is cut for the present, under instructions, to $12,475,328, not including anything for "the cost of construction for naval purposes" nor for the Navy, the necessary "naval establishments," nor for the naval equipment, emplacements, armament, and forces to occupy them recommended by the board. Important points at both termini deemed necessary by the board for sufficient fortifications are also excluded from the present estimate, and only 12 companies of Coast Artillery, 4 regiments of Infantry, 1 battalion of Field Artillery, and 1 squadron of Cavalry—ordinarily, as now recruited, about 5,000 effective men; no naval forces—are estimated for as "an army garrison to be maintained on the Canal Zone in time of peace." This would be an average of about 100 men to the mile—not a respectable police force. Stoessel was shut up and finally captured in 1905 by Japan at Port Arthur with an army garrison strongly fortified, stationed in time of peace, of 25,000 men. To fortify and garrison a zone thus feebly 50 miles in length would only invite prompt capture by an enemy if war broke out.

If the canal is to be fortified and blockaded, it should be done with such ample works, armament and garrisons, naval stations and forces, and vessels of war as would defy the greatest naval power. There dare not be fortifications with garrisons and naval stations and navy only sufficient in time of peace.

If the United States assumes, as to the canal, an attitude of war, it must always there keep on a war footing, otherwise it would be seized before the defenses could be enlarged or reenforced. This would only be modern experience. Wars break out suddenly now, differing from earlier times. If fortifications, naval stations, and so forth, are to be established on the canal they should be adequate and kept ready at all times for strong war.

An estimate to cover the original cost for ample fortifications, armament, garrisons, permanent camps and barracks, naval stations, dry docks, searchlights and fire control, marines, purchase of sites, ships to be constantly at the stations, and so forth, of $100,000,000 will prove far too low; likewise, an estimate for their annual maintenance, including sanitation, of $10,000,000 is too low.

In my estimates I include nothing in the way of military and naval construction not recommended by the Fortification Board; and I have omitted from them the cost of positions outside of the Canal Zone on the mainland and islands, which the board seem to regard as important.

There seems to be a well-grounded belief among our high military officers that the fortifications on our main, or continental coasts, and our small Regular Army and Navy are far from adequate for our protection in the event of war, and that many millions of dollars should be promptly spent to put our country in only scant preparedness for war. If this is true, then it alone furnishes a most important reason why we should not fortify the Panama Canal if it can otherwise be protected.

Our continental coast line, excluding bays and inlets and the Alaskan coast, is above 32,000 miles in length, one and a third times the circumference of the earth at the Equator.

An army constantly kept on the Isthmus would be subject to the ravages of disease common to it, unless the sanitation now maintained thereon at an annual cost aside from administration of about $2,000,000 was kept up. But for such sanitation the canal would not be built, as the Chagres River-Isthmus region is naturally the most deadly one from disease, yellow fever and the like, in all the world, as its history for above 400 years proves. It is not proposed to maintain such general sanitation beyond the time of its completion.

Our Army and Navy, to meet the new and additional requirements resulting from the United States having constantly to protect the Panama Canal, would have to be increased from their present inadequate strength at least 25 per cent before there would be any well-grounded security in case of a sudden outbreak of war. The strength of the Regular Army on October 15, 1910, was 4,310 officers and 67,459 enlisted men. The cost of creating such increases and the necessary additional cost of maintaining continuously a considerable number of soldiers, sailors, and marines on the canal and its adjacent waters would be comparatively very great, as all their wants would have to be supplied from long distances; in time of war convoyed to them.

This country should hesitate long before taking upon it such an additional and oppressive burden at a time when there is little or no room to doubt that existing international treaties completely guarantee the neutralization of the canal, and also when a more general international treaty, easily negotiated, will effectually and perpetually protect it in a state of neutralization without special expense to the United States and by which it will forever, irrespective of the events of war, have its title thereto guaranteed, with all the revenues receivable therefrom.

The foregoing are only some of the principal reasons why, for strategic purposes in time of war to which the United States is a party, it should on every consideration of interest rejoice over the neutralization of the Panama Canal.

The tendency of this age is toward the neutralization of waterways and of countries, in the interest of peace. The Black Sea, a large portion of the Danube, the Bosphorus, the Dardanelles, the Straits of Magellan, Switzerland, Belgium, Norway, the Rio Grande, and many other rivers, all have been neutralized by effective treaties. For over 75 years, the Rush-Bagot arrangement has been in operation, neutralizing, to all intent, the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River.

The neutralization of our great waterway through international agreement, will be a majestic contribution to the cause of universal peace. There is but one country that can take the initiative in this matter. That country is the United States. This is the day of our opportunity, if we would go forward as peacemakers. Prudence, sound policy, and material interest alike counsel us to extend an invitation to the powers of the world, to participate in a conference to neutralize the canal. Such a step will be the inevitable beginning of universal neutralization, a consummation most devoutly to be wished. The construction of the Panama Canal is the crowning achievement of an age of material wonders. Wonderful indeed have been the triumphs of the Anglo-Saxon people over the physical world.

We have tunneled the heart of darkness, we have traveled the upper air,
For who shall write in the book of man, this thing thou shalt not dare?
So we of the race of dominance, lords of hand, and of brain,
Have wielded the staff of Moses, and cloven the land in twain.

The races of men will mingle, when the seas of the earth are wed,
The ships of a hundred nations, the path of the sun will thread,
And the golden galleys of commerce, borne by the winds of fate,
Will cast their magnificent anchors, hard by the Golden Gate.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is a curious fact that in all the discussions relative to the fortification of the Panama Canal—a subject that has been acute not only in the minds of the American people, but of the world for the past few months—no voices have been raised, save those of Americans, to deny the power of this country to fortify and protect the Panama Canal.

Is it not a very curious fact, if the position of these gentlemen be correct, that England should remain silent now for eight years after an express declaration on the part of America that we propose to fortify the canal? Is it not a curious fact that in the year 1903 the treaty made with Panama, by which we acquired the sovereignty which enables us to build the canal, carried expressly a provision stating that we had the right to fortify the canal?

If that was in contravention of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, then was the time for England to declare her opposition and to let this country know that in her opinion she would consider an attempt at fortification on our part a violation of the treaty. But nothing has occurred on the part of the other contracting party to indicate that she considers that we are violating her rights. When we passed the Spooner Act no protest came from England to declare that that act was in contravention of the treaty; and yet if it be true that the treaty denied the power to fortify, the fact that that act expressly instructed the President not only to build but to make provision for the defense of the canal made it a violation of that treaty.

But, gentlemen, how absurd in the light of the history that surrounds the building of the great American canal this contention must seem! We entered into a treaty in 1850 with England, known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and I state that that treaty had more to do with the delaying of the building of the Panama Canal than any other single thing. Shortly after it was entered into American statesmen realized, because of the geographical condition of this country and the development of the great West of America, that we could not afford to have a canal across the Isthmus which was not an American canal, controlled by Americans, policed by Americans, and, if need be, defended by Americans.

And so it was that negotiations were begun and continued for years to get away from the binding effect of that treaty, and Mr. Blaine, in one of his papers to the British Government, called attention to the various reasons why this country could not rest content to leave that treaty in existence without limit of time; that conditions had so changed as to make it essential that America should be free to build and defend her own canal. And when, after years of such negotiation, a treaty was submitted by President Roosevelt that left some doubt on this question, it was rejected by the Senate of the United States, and another treaty was found to be necessary, and as a result we have the treaty of November, 1901.

Is it not a curious fact that in that treaty not only is the first article a repeal of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but the statement that the contracting parties shall be the guarantors of the neutrality of the canal that was in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty is omitted, and it is provided that the United States itself shall guarantee that neutrality?

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman please indicate that clause? I am perfectly certain there is no such clause in the treaty at all.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman should not be so sure about it.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will read it, he will find that it relates to the adoption of the neutralization provided for under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. SHERLEY. It does relate to the adoption of a basis of neutralization, but this fact is to be borne in mind, that the treaty prior to that in dealing with the same subject of the adoption of rules of neutralization declared that the high contracting parties adopted, and so forth. Why, then, in this treaty the unusual language that the United States adopts, and so forth? If there was meant to be no difference, if the same idea was to be conveyed, why bring into the matter a question of doubt? Why change the usual language in diplomatic agreements and bring in an unusual term?

Mr. KEIFER. It was in the preamble.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know what the gentleman means, but what I have stated I hope is plain to the committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take the very brief time allotted to me in a statement as to our right to fortify.

To my mind, no man can approach that question with an open mind and read all of the treaties relating to it and come to any other conclusion, particularly in view of the silence of the nations that might have a right to protest. I say again that it is curious that some of us here should be the only ones to find a violation of treaty obligations.

But assuming that we have the right to fortify, I want to discuss somewhat briefly the reasons why we should fortify. I shall never willingly consent to the proposition that, having spent $400,000,000 to create this canal joining the two oceans, a canal that was built largely because of what we believed was a military necessity, for it remains yet to be determined whether economically we have been justified in this vast expenditure of money—I say I shall never agree after having expended that amount of money to leave that canal open in a time of war to our enemy upon the same conditions as we could use it ourselves. Such a proposition seems to me almost idiotic. Neutrality when we are at war, for that is what you have to consider, presents one of two propositions: Either the canal must be closed to both the United States and its enemy, or open to both during the war. In either event we give our enemy everything and get nothing. It has been repeatedly stated that the justification of the canal was that it made our fleet twice as effective; that it enabled it if in the Atlantic to go through into the Pacific, and if in the Pacific to go through into the Atlantic; and yet, if this canal is to be neutralized in the sense in which these gentlemen mean it, in case of war with Germany and our fleet happened to be on the Pacific, we could not use the canal, or if we could use it Germany could use it also. If we had war with Japan and our fleet was in the Atlantic, the same thing would be true. In other words, we destroy the material advantage we should have from building the canal.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. TAWNEY. I assume that the gentleman is familiar with the debates, especially in the Senate, where the matter was debated at great length as to whether we should authorize the construction of the canal. Has the gentleman been able to find, or can he point to but one sentence in that debate, uttered by Senator Hanna, to the effect that we would authorize or propose to authorize the canal as a military asset or for military purposes?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not familiar enough with the debates to tell the gentleman. Even assuming that the gentleman's statement is correct, it would not necessarily determine anything. Why, if we had to determine what laws meant by what is said on this floor as to what they mean, Lord have mercy upon us and the administration of justice! There are enough opinions given every day on every bill that comes up here to substantiate any contention.

But I go back to the proposition as to what is our duty as a Nation looking forward to the events of the future. Neutrality is a beautiful dream, but neutrality has never yet stayed the hand of a nation that felt its national life imperiled. I would like to see possible the Utopian dream of these gentlemen when men shall cease to go to war, and when everything shall be decided in a great international court of justice, but that day is far, very far away. We are told of the neutrality of the Suez Canal. Prior to the adoption of the convention of 1888 did England observe the neutrality of the Suez Canal when she went to war?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. By no means. She seized part of the canal and made it the base of her operations. That was her conception of neutrality when she felt the necessity of the moment. Not only that, but she has never yet agreed in so many terms, and within recent years has through a high official denied, that she had fully given her consent and was bound by the terms of the Suez agreement.

I say to you another thing—that if she did, the conditions are in no sense similar to those in America. The Suez is her route to India and to Australia, yet the route around the Cape of Good Hope is not much greater than it is through the canal. The Panama Canal is our route to the Pacific, but it is infinitely shorter than the route around South America. Not only is that true, but England has always depended for her supremacy on the navy—on the fact that she maintains a navy equal to the strength of any two other nations. She looks to that to protect her rights and she looks to Gibraltar and to the fortifications that she has put right at the mouth, so to speak, of the Suez to enable her to maintain her position. But let us take up another contingency. Suppose Suez was captured or taken by an enemy of England. It would in no sense imperil her safety, but if Panama falls into the hands of an enemy of America the situation is entirely different. The cases are in no sense parallel. But we hear much of the neutralization of certain countries. Men speak of Switzerland, and yet Switzerland maintains an army of extreme effectiveness in order to make certain that neutrality. They talk of the neutrality of Belgium, and yet when the Franco-Prussian War came on it was the marching of the Belgian soldiers along the frontier that preserved her neutrality to her. I am not willing to leave what I believe to be practically a coastline of America to the uncertainties of the observance of treaty obligations, even though all the nations of the earth enter into them.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; for a question.

Mr. KEIFER. I wanted to know the date of the time the gentleman says England seized the Suez Canal.

Mr. SHERLEY. I can find it in a moment, but the gentleman can hardly expect me to go through papers now. I will give it to him personally in a few moments. Let me suggest another thought to the members of this committee. What happens in the case of the violation of neutrality? Who is to do the punishing? Where is the great international force that shall guarantee the observance of international agreements? Suppose we have a war with a foreign country, do you suppose all the other nations of the earth are going to be on our side? No; the moral support of a number of them will be with our opponents. Do you suppose that in case of violation of neutrality by our opponent that those whose sympathies or whose interests lie with our opponent are going to come in and punish? Gentlemen should remember that the Panama Canal is American property, a natural place for an enemy to seek to seize, and he can well risk the uncertain and future punishment of neutrals whose interests are not involved for the great advantage he would have in striking almost a deathblow at his enemy. If we want to make certain the neutrality of this Isthmus we must do it by our own power, by our own force. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman from Ohio give me about 10 seconds?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. My friend from Tennessee asked a question, and I desire now to give him the information in order to have it go in the RECORD. In December, 1849, the President instructed Mr. Foote, then our minister to New Granada, to urge upon that Government to take measures to negotiate a treaty with Great Britain to secure a guaranty of neutrality for the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised at the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, whom I have always regarded as absolutely correct when he discusses a proposition. I am surprised at the statement that he makes that this canal was constructed primarily as a military basis of operations. Why, Mr. Chairman, for more than 75 years every message that was sent to Congress by the Presidents of the United States dealt with this question purely upon a commercial basis. The gentleman talks about this canal being a matter of strategic importance as a military point and was chiefly built for that purpose. I want to call his attention and the attention of this committee to the fact that after we had the War with Spain, after we had sent the Oregon around the Horn in 1898, two years after that, President McKinley sent a message to Congress, and with it a treaty, asking that this canal, when built, should not be fortified, should never be blockaded, but should be open in time of war and in time of peace to all nations and to all flags.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, President Roosevelt, subsequent to the recommendation of President McKinley when sending the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the Senate, made the same recommendation.

Mr. CLINE. He did the same thing, Mr. Chairman, and I call attention to the message of President Roosevelt in 1904, in which he reiterated the same proposition. Talk about the neutrality of the Suez Canal! Why, Mr. Chairman, the Suez Canal has always been on a basis of absolute neutrality; and in 1887, when Russia intimated that she would blockade that canal, which never has been blockaded and has always been open to the trade of every nation on the globe, England submitted to Russia that she would consider any attempt to blockade it as an interference with her interests in India, and as a result of that the six great nations of Europe met at Constantinople in 1888 and signed an agreement whereby they were to maintain the canal absolutely on the basis of neutrality——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLINE. No; I can not yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. Has England ever signed that agreement?

Mr. CLINE. I can not yield. Absolutely on a basis of neutrality. I want to call the gentleman's attention to another proposition, viz, that we never have negotiated a treaty with South America and never negotiated a treaty with England or with any other power with reference to a transcontinental route over the Isthmus, but what we urged as the very basis of that treaty the absolute neutrality of the canal. Now, I want to call attention to another fact which seems to me to be important. When the treaty of 1901 was before the Senate it contained, which were afterwards adopted, these provisions:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce; that it never should be blockaded; that vessels of war of belligerents shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; that no belligerents shall embark or disembark troops; that the provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. It contains all the elements of neutrality. Now it happened at that time Mr. CULBERSON of Texas offered this resolution:

> It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

What did the Senate of the United States do with that proposition? It voted it down by a vote of 44 to 26. Does that look as though they wanted to constitute the canal a strategic point in times of war and fortify it? Another proposition that was made there was made by Mr. TILLMAN, that we should strike out the provision for the neutrality of that canal based upon the provisions of the Constantinople agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. TILLMAN offered a proposition that we should strike out the very basis of this neutralization that was found in the Constantinople agreement. And the Senate of the United States refused by a vote of 65 to 15 to do that. Then come back and tell me that we reserved in that treaty the right to fortify? Why did not the United States say so in the treaty if it proposed to reserve the right to fortify? That is the proposition. Why did it not do so in that treaty? I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Congress of the United States in adopting that treaty knew that the agreement was that England had conceded to us the right simply to protect the canal against lawlessness and disorder by policing it; and not to fortify.

And another fact, England refused to ratify that treaty, and the correspondence is here, until the United States should make as the basis of it the provisions for neutrality as embodied in the Constantinople convention.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Is the Constantinople convention the one that dealt with the Suez Canal?

Mr. CLINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEIFER. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Eighteen minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, before he left the floor I asked the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] if it was satisfactory to him if at 7 o'clock, inasmuch as it was due to the Members who have remained here and have not yet had an opportunity to get anything to eat, to take a recess until 8 o'clock. Members have gone away with the idea and understanding, which was, in fact, made upon the floor of the House, that this debate would continue until half past 7 o'clock, and that the debate under the five-minute rule would not commence until then. So it would not be fair for us to go on and conclude the consideration of this matter now.

Mr. HINSHAW. Some of us have stayed here for two hours now, expecting to vote.

Mr. TAWNEY. I suggest we take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I object to that. I have stayed here all the time without knowing anything about that arrangement.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object to the unanimous consent reserved by the gentleman, I would like to know if there are any gentlemen who desire to be heard further?

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] has consumed all of his time except 5 minutes, and he said there was no demand for it, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has consumed all of his time except 18 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think he reserved the five minutes himself, in the event that he might want to close the debate.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say that he reserved that for himself. Let us take a recess, say, until 7 o'clock and 30 minutes, then. I have not had anything to eat since breakfast. At the suggestion of gentlemen around me, I move that we take a recess until 7.40 p. m.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that the committee will have to rise before taking a recess.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I then move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BENNET of New York having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MANN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 7.40 p. m.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, what is the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is anything the House may bring before it.

Mr. HINSHAW. I am in favor, Mr. Speaker, of the regular order. I want the House to go ahead and read this bill. Some of us have stayed here two hours, now, expecting this vote, and I am not going to stay here for it until the time mentioned, and I think some others are of the same opinion, if you are going to take a recess.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HINSHAW] demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the regular order?

Mr. BUTLER. To go back into committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 32909, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 32909, the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. MANN in the chair.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, this is too important a debate to be carried on before empty desks. If we are going to stay here and debate, I do not see why the Members should not be here.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that he make his point; let him go ahead and make it.

Mr. SIMS. Very well. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting). Fifty-seven gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Under the rule the committee rose; and Mr. BENNET of New York having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MANN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the sundry civil bill and, finding itself without a quorum, the Chairman, under the rule, instructed the Clerk to call the roll, and he returned herewith a list of the absentees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and eight Members are present—a quorum—and the committee will resume its sitting.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. The two hours for general debate having expired, would it be in order to ask for the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has not expired.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, the time for general debate expired at 7.20.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken; it did not.

Mr. KENDALL. Does the Chair have any disinclination to advise the House when it will expire?

The CHAIRMAN. It will expire after two hours of general debate.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, the matter of protecting the valuable property of the country—when finished $400,000,000 will have been expended—is of grave importance to the Nation.

I realize that an honest difference may exist as to the propriety of fortifying the Isthmian Canal.

Having had the satisfaction of visiting this great enterprise and investigating the matter as fully as my limited time would permit, I am convinced that the Committee on Appropriations acted wisely in making this provision, so as to permit the inauguration of the proper fortifications.

I am heartily in favor of the plan to fortify the canal. It is too great a risk to trust to peaceful measures. Treaties and neutralization are all right, but in case of war I had rather trust to proper fortifications and a well-disciplined and fully equipped Army and Navy.

The other day we discussed the urgency of adding 430 officers to the Regular Army. This was intended to supply the National Guard of the States, the mainstay of the Nation in time of domestic trouble or foreign invasion. The false spirit of economy in vogue in this Congress caused that necessary addition to be cut down to 230. Prudence would have justified an increase instead of a decrease, and I trust that the body at the other end of the Capitol will at least restore the number to 430.

I have great faith in the National Guard, the nucleus of grand volunteer armies, upon which the country must rely in case of war, of which, thank God, no cloud is visible anywhere. The views of that distinguished engineer in charge of the Isthmian Canal, Col. Goethals, whom we had the satisfaction of hearing in this Chamber last week, confirms me in my conviction that fortifications should be started at once and completed as early as practicable.

It will afford me special pleasure to vote for the appropriation of $3,000,000 recommended by the Appropriations Committee in this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair is correct, the gentleman has 5 minutes and the gentleman from Ohio has 18 minutes remaining.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am not going, as I indicated in the first place, to make any systematic answer to the various things that have been stated here. I only wish now to call attention to some mistakes that have been made by gentlemen who have preceded me. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] finds, on looking at his memorandum, that the incident in which he says England seized the Suez Canal and violated the treaty at one time was in 1878, just 10 years before the treaty was formed. [Applause.]

England did do certain things at that time in violation of some things that the Khedive of Egypt, under the Sultan of Turkey, was trying to maintain which was thought not to be honorable; but it was out of this and for the purpose of preventing that very thing from ever occurring again that the great nations of Europe, consisting of Russia, Turkey, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain, France, and England, entered into the Suez Canal treaty, and it has never been violated from that day to this. According to my inquiry, not a single dollar has ever been expended looking to the fortification of the Suez Canal in any way. No fortifications have been built or exist for its blockade or defense.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does the gentleman claim that the treaty of Constantinople has ever gone into effect by its terms?

Mr. KEIFER. Absolutely; and the United States in June, 1898, appealed to Great Britain, that controlled it largely, to know whether under the terms of it we might send a fleet through the canal without interruption, and it was said that we could, and Spain, with whom we were then at war, assented to it. [Applause.] I put the correspondence between the State Department and the English authorities in my speech here of May 17, 1910.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. KOPP. In the case of the Suez Canal, would it ever have been practicable to operate the canal except by international treaty?

Mr. KEIFER. With or without an international treaty in time of peace. I suspect that the gentleman has in his mind the proposition that international treaties are only made for peace and not for war, but the rule is that they are made for war and never for peace. Neutralization for peace! That is the most absurd suggestion that was ever made. Neutralization is to prevent war involving certain property or territory when war exists. But for war there would and could be no such thing as neutralization. No nation can alone neutralize its own possessions. It requires an international treaty to guarantee neutralization and to make it effective. International treaties neutralizing a great common-carrier public highway like the Panama Canal is designed to be, in which all the nations of the world have a common interest, never have been and never will be disregarded. Such treaties are wholly different from treaties between two nations or treaties merely to neutralize a territory or country solely for the benefit of its inhabitants. The latter treaties may sometimes be broken, the former never are.

I might say about this document the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] read from, that if he will look at the title he will find it was prepared by somebody advocating, doubtless, the ratification of the treaty of November, 1901, regardless of what its stipulations were, not by John Hay, who had negotiated it for the United States, but the document was prepared with reference to the operation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the only thing John Hay had to do with it was to send it up to the Senate, where they disregarded it all the way through. He knew the treaty spoke for itself and was plain and easy of construction.

Mr. DIEKEMA. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] makes the positive statement that this communication was sent by Mr. Hay.

Mr. KEIFER. That is true.

Mr. DIEKEMA. And the gentleman from Ohio denies it. What reason has he for denying that this is the authentic statement made that Mr. Hay sent it to the Senate?

Mr. KEIFER. I say he stated the truth if he stated it in that way, and that is exactly what the paper says. There is some fine print in brackets here, under the heading on page 2, which reads:

Prepared in the Department of State and sent by Mr. Hay to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KENDALL. Did it not go there with his authority?

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, the gentleman is making a discussion about it. Why did he not prepare it? Because he concurred in what President Roosevelt said, that the treaty carried with it all the neutralization policies that had been maintained in this country for 50 years, and as embodied in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; and that is the reason he did not prepare any such stuff as that. But they say the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded, both the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Kentucky, and they talk as though they believed that. In the proclamation the President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt, says that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was set aside.

Without impairing the general principles of neutralization established in Article VIII of that convention.

The preamble to this Hay-Pauncefote treaty recites that it is made to remove all objection to the construction by the United States of a canal that may arise out of the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—

Without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in Article VIII of that convention.

I turn now to Article IV of the same treaty and read:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

This I read from the treaty of November 18, 1901, now in force. Nothing is plainer than that all the neutralization established by the 1850 Clayton-Bulwer treaty was continued and still remains in full force.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman what he has to say with reference to the first article of the existing treaty, which is that the high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention, which was the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman asks a question that seems to come too late, as it is plainly declared in the opening part of the treaty that the neutralization of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is to be preserved, as the President of the United States in his proclamation, which I hold in my hand, states; and the fourth article thereof, that I have just read, says the same thing. So the neutralization of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was readopted in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and it remains still in full force. Now, I want to call attention to another mistake on this same line. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], I think it was, who talked about a clause in the treaty by which we preserved only certain principles of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and he was as careless about that as some other things, for where that is spoken of in the treaty nothing is said about the Clayton-Bulwer treaty at all. I read the first paragraph of article 3, to which he referred:

The United States adopts as a basis of neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed October 28, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal.

And there is not a word in that article or any article of the treaty in relation to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty at all, but it only adopts the neutralization principles—nonfortification, no act of war, and no blockade—of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which is continued in force, and by Article III the rules of neutralization "substantially as embodied" in the Suez Canal treaty are also adopted and, in effect, made part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and made applicable to the Panama Canal.

Both the gentlemen from Iowa and Kentucky, with apparent earnestness, refer to and quote from paragraph 1, Article III, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and exclaim loudly that it shows that the United States alone guarantees the neutralization of the canal, and they pretend to think that it could do so.

There is not a word in that paragraph about the United States or any nation guaranteeing neutralization; it only refers to the basis of neutralization. It reads:

The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules.

And so forth. This claim is hardly ingenuous.

Article IV, as I have shown, and other parts of the treaty speak of "the obligation of the high contracting parties" to neutralize the canal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one other thing. Somebody says that we made a treaty with the Republic of Panama by which we expressly provided for the fortification of the canal. Now, if I wanted to go on record, I would say there was no such treaty ever made and nobody ever discovered one of that kind.

Let me read from the treaty, the last one in date. It speaks for itself, and if gentlemen are right that the November (1901) treaty means nothing, we have had the silliest, most foolish, and most ignorant class of people at the head of this Government for some years past that could possibly be conceived of. Turn to the eighteenth article of the treaty with the Republic of Panama, which bears date of November 18, 1903, and after the Spooner Act was passed that gentlemen here have been talking about, signed two years to a day after the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901:

The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutralized in perpetuity and shall be open upon the terms provided by section 1 of Article III of and in conformity with the stipulations entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

That is the sort of agreement for fortifications we find; but, to nail down the question, turn to Article XXV of the same treaty, which reads: "For the better performance of the engagements of this convention and to the end of an efficient protection of the canal and the preservation of its neutrality the Government of the Republic of Panama will" do so and so. Protection; they talk about that as though it meant something. In the Suez Canal treaty is a provision for protection, and in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, now in force, of November 18, 1901, is a provision for protection, and in the twenty-third article of the Panama treaty there is a like provision for protection when necessary and when neutralization is assailed. Article XXIII of the Panama treaty does not permit any preliminary or precautionary preparations, only measures to be taken when found necessary. But nobody ever dreamed of neutralization or of maintaining it always by purely peaceable means. Why not fight to maintain it in case of attack? The treaties all provide, in effect, to defend neutralization when it is assailed, and indemnity for violating would be required. The Suez Canal treaty provides that the signatory powers of that great treaty may keep two ships at either end of the canal at Port Said or Suez, not to do anything more than to protect it in case its neutralization is assailed. That is all; and we have a provision in our treaty providing that we may do the same thing.

I notice my friend MILLER of Kansas here who read the other day a clause of the Panama treaty and insisted on keeping out of his speech the only provisions in it that provided for neutralization. Now, let us see what the United States may do. Under the second section or paragraph of Article III of the 1901 treaty we find this:

The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

If it stopped there, the United States might have seemed to have been shut out, for neutralization shuts out every act of war. But, prudently, they shift over, as they said in the Senate, and as the draftsman said, they shifted the clause that was to take the place of section 7 of Article II of the 1901 treaty, which section expressly forbade fortifications, so as to take the place of the section but to have the same effect. I now read what immediately follows the clause I have just read:

The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

That is to say, notwithstanding all the neutralization, notwithstanding all the prohibition against blockade or acts of war, the United States may have such military police along the canal as to protect it against lawlessness and disorder. However, the United States, the treaty says, may do certain specified things.

Now, some of these gentlemen here are lawyers and judges. Will they say that, having expressed these things in the treaty, it means to include everything else, or is the rule of the law, as laid down by the Judges of the Supreme Court with reference to treaties or with reference to contracts and compacts, that wherever you express a right or a power, that is to the exclusion of all others? Gentlemen seem to proceed on the idea here that, by omitting the word "fortifying" in one place or "in time of war as in time of peace" in another, the United States is authorized to do that which will override other provisions of the treaty, to wit, fortify and blockade at the same time. Later on I shall speak more at length on this matter.

The notion about fortifying the canal and still not blockade it, as my friend from Iowa suggests, is like a man who, being afraid that some burglar will break into his house and steal his goods, hires policemen to stand at his front and back doors to keep them open so that the burglars can get in without any trouble instead of breaking the doors.

Strategy, says my friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. That is also where we differ. I have cited examples before in my speeches and can do so now. If we are to have a war, if we throw down the gauntlet of war on the canal, we will, at least, have to have half of our Army as now constituted and more than half of the Navy down there to protect the canal, or we will lose it. If the enemy is on the Pacific, we will go there and defeat him. If the enemy is on the Atlantic, we will go there. If he is in both places, we will deal with him in detail. If he is so strong that he will beat us in either place, the canal will not help us or him. It is ridiculous to suppose that we should have to tie up a part of our Army and Navy to protect a piece of property. Neutralization of the canal is different from a declaration of a neutralization of a country like Switzerland. That is where the people have the protection of others from attack and enjoy their neutrality. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in January of this year the Senate adopted a resolution as follows:

Resolved, That a brief history of the amendments proposed and considered relative to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty be printed as a public document.

In pursuance of that resolution Senate Document No. 746 was printed. It starts with this heading:

A brief history of the amendments proposed and considered since the action of the Senate on the former canal treaty with Great Britain and which have resulted in the treaty now submitted.

Referring to the present existing treaty between Great Britain and the United States:

Prepared in the Department of State and sent by Mr. Hay to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

It seems to me a mere caviling about words to say that this is not the information furnished by that greatest of modern American diplomats, John Hay, to the Senate in support of the ratification of the existing treaty with Great Britain. It was from this document that I read at length at the opening of this debate.

I was very glad to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] avow, and, I should call it, admit that it was no use to talk about neutralization except with a power to enforce neutralization; that the treaty of Constantinople, which he says is in force, but which I do not think by its terms has yet taken effect, provided for naval vessels to enforce the neutrality. In that case the nations adhering to the treaty mutually guaranteed the neutrality. In this case the United States repudiated international guaranty of neutrality, and it has proclaimed neutrality which I concede will be generally applicable in time of war.

But it is senseless for the United States to declare that it will maintain neutrality with popguns against the navies of foreign nations that have not agreed to respect the neutrality of the canal. The very purpose, and the prime purpose, of fortification is the same purpose contemplated in the treaty of Constantinople—to maintain the neutrality and see that it is not violated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to pursue this debate further, and I yield back the balance of my time, trusting that if anything should arise in the five-minute debate requiring a reply I may be permitted to reply.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Iowa says that the United States agreed with Panama——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, no; agreed with Great Britain. I did not say anything about Panama.

Mr. BORLAND. The United States is under obligation to Panama by its treaty to guarantee its neutrality.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I did not say that.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman concede that to be a fact?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not care to assume any such thing.

Mr. BORLAND. If that is correct, does it not entail upon the United States at least a moral obligation to obtain from foreign powers a treaty for the neutralization of the canal?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The treaty I referred to was repudiated in the American Senate, and the Senate would not accept a treaty of that kind. We are in no position now to say that. Having a treaty to that effect and refusing to take it, and announcing our ability and courageous purpose to defend it with American manhood, we are now going to back out and say we can not defend our own property.

Mr. BORLAND. After the British treaty was concluded, we have since entered into a treaty with Panama to secure its neutrality.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, no; there is no such provision. We are proposing to maintain neutrality and maintain it with big guns.

Mr. KEIFER. To maintain it in violation of the treaty. There is a provision as to how we are to do it, and the gentleman is proposing to violate it and bring on trouble before the canal is built. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, when the Post Office appropriation bill was up for consideration I sought an opportunity to discuss certain provisions of the bill, but as time was limited I was prevented from doing so, and now avail myself of the opportunity to call attention to the exorbitant rate paid to the railroad companies by the Government for carrying the mail; to point out this undue activity on the part of the railroads in favor of parcels post and the impossibility of establishing parcels post that would be beneficial and self-supporting. I believe this matter worthy of the most careful and thoughtful consideration. To begin with, How are the transportation companies paid? The present rates per pound weight were first fixed by the act of March 3, 1873. These were reduced 10 per cent by the act of July 12, 1876, and 5 per cent more by the act of June 17, 1878, and 5 per cent more by the act of March 2, 1907. First, the pay is based solely on the average weight of the mail carried daily the whole length of the route, but when a full railway post-office car is added to the train the Post Office Department pays to the railroad a rental for the entire car, based upon its length, or an average of $5,427.62 a car. The cars cost about $5,500 or $6,000 each, and are maintained and repaired at an annual cost of about $1,200. They are built and owned by the railroad companies and rented to the Post Office Department. The pay for a line of these cars is $25 a mile for 40-foot cars, $30 for 45-foot cars, $40 for 50-foot cars, and $50 for 55 or 60 foot cars.

I include in my remarks a schedule of rates of railway mail transportation which covers the present and recent laws on that subject:

Act of March 2, 1907, decrease of 5 per cent on each 2,000 pounds in excess of 5,000 pounds.
Land-grant roads receive 80 per cent of rate.

The Postmaster General states in his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, that the expenditures for that year for transportation of mails on railroads was $44,654,515.97 and $4,686,122.27 for railway post-office car service, or a total of $49,340,638.24. This Government pays the railroads practically $50,000,000 a year for carrying the mail. If we have the amount paid and the number of pounds carried, it is an easy matter to determine the average rate paid per pound. In compliance with the directions of the provisions of the act of March 2, 1907, in the post-office appropriation bill, all mail matter and equipments used in connection therewith and empty equipments dispatched were weighed for the period from July 1 to December 31, 1907, and which is reported in Table B to be: Total weight of mail matter, 618,130,722.15 pounds; equipment carried in connection therewith, 414,073,490.9 pounds; empty equipment dispatched, 53,848,134.1 pounds; total weight of domestic mails and equipments, 1,086,052,348.2 pounds, for six months. If you multiply it by two you have total mail matter, 1,236,261,444.3 pounds; total equipments, 935,843,250.6 pounds; or a total of 2,172,104,696.4 pounds. These figures, of course, are necessarily estimates, because the mail carried in the first six months of the year varies from the amount carried in the last six months. When the post-office appropriation bill was under consideration last year the distinguished chairman of that committee furnished this House with this information. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Feb. 24, p. 2348.) The department estimates the net weight of the mails for 1908 as follows:

	Pounds.
First class	167, 502, 610
Second class	785, 833, 110
Third class	179, 694, 654
Fourth class	58, 889, 400
Franked	4, 531, 080
Departmental	43, 092, 474
Foreign	60, 814, 956
Total	1, 300, 358, 284

In order to ascertain the average rate paid per pound to railroads for carrying the mail, we should deduct from this amount about 200,000,000 pounds which is not carried by the railroads—for instance, all of the local delivery, much of the free in the county, as well as much mail matter sent out on star routes and rural free delivery. Much of the foreign mail matter is not carried by railroads, as much of it is sent direct from post offices in the larger cities with ports, such as New York, Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and others, and in all probability the railroads do not carry more than 1,100,000,000 pounds. If so, and if they are paid $50,000,000, the rate paid is more than 4½ cents a pound. But we will be liberal and grant that they carry one and a quarter billion pounds. The appropriations for 1911 for transportation by railroads and railway post-office cars was $50,000,574. That amount makes it more than 4 cents a pound, but you say that in determining the average rate paid railway companies the weight of equipments should be included. By so doing the rate paid railway companies would be less, but the Government gets paid for mail matter only, express companies get paid for actual weight of packages handled, and equipments are furnished by both the Government and the express companies; hence in making the comparison the weight of equipments has nothing to do with it.

It is fair to assume that the Government pays on an average at least 4 cents per pound for carrying mail matter. Compare this with the rate charged by the express companies for carrying express, not what the express companies pay the railroads for carrying express, but the rate charged the public by express companies for services rendered. If you will look over the Interstate Commerce Commission's first annual reports of the statistics of express companies in the United States for the year ending June 30, 1909, you will find that the average revenue received per piece was $0.5049, the average revenue paid per pound $0.0154, the total revenue $35,856,551.56 for handling in the aggregate 2,329,342,192 pounds in three months, as for April, August, and December, 1909. The number of pounds transported in three months is about twice the amount of mail matter transported in a year. The revenue of express companies is a little more than 1½ cents per pound as compared with 4 cents paid per pound by the Government. The Government then pays the railroads for carrying mail matter nearly three times the amount charged the public by express companies, and about seven times the amount the express companies pay railroads for carrying express. I quote from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission of December 21, 1910, page 27.

The statistical information contained in this report covers the operations of 13 companies. The names of these companies, as also the mileage over which each operates, are as follows:

The character of the business transacted by the express companies is indicated by the following statement, which shows for the months of April, August, and December, 1909, the number of pieces carried, their aggregate weight, the average weight per piece, the total revenue, the average revenue per piece, and the average revenue per pound. The expenses incident to the compilation of the information by the express companies deterred the commission from requiring such a compilation for all the months of the year, but the combined results for the months selected may be accepted as typical of the business for the year.

Summary of traffic for April, August, and December, 1909.

Number of pieces		71,013,295
Aggregate weight	pounds	2,329,342,192
Average weight per piece	do	32.80
Revenue		$35,856,551.56
Average revenue per piece	cents	50.49
Average revenue per pound	do	1.54

Now, having pointed out the difference in the rate paid by the Government and the rate charged by express companies, I want to say a word about parcel posts and the express companies.

With these facts before us it seems to me they ought to settle the question for all time to come that under the present arrangements and with the present rate paid railroad companies for carying mail matter parcels post can not be made beneficial to the public or self-supporting, and with the present rates paid, in order to make the service of any value whatever, a heavy draft must be made on the Treasury. It also ought to ease the minds of those who are laboring under the delusion that the express companies fear Government competition and are opposed to parcels-post legislation. Certainly a corporation or individual who can carry parcels at a profit at $1.54 a hundred has nothing to fear from a competitor where the service costs the competitor three times the amount he is performing the service for, and, mind you, the revenue paid railroad companies for carrying mail matter is but a small part of the total expense of handling mail matter by the Government. The total expense of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending 1910 was $229,509,680.36. If the total weight was 1,250,000,000 pounds, the average cost was more than 18 cents a pound. Why this difference in cost? To begin with, the business of the express company is conducted by business men and on business lines, the Post Office Department is conducted by Congress and the department, and like all other business conducted by the Government, it is the most expensive, and until Congress and the departments adopt business methods and conduct its business as business men do, it of course can not compete with individuals or corporations.

Much has been said about the express companies exerting their influence against parcels-post legislation, and I regret to say that this claim is made by many who know, or ought to know, better. What are the facts? The express companies are merely subcompanies of the railroad companies. The express business properly belongs to the railroads, but the railroads, like many other large companies, the management, or those in control, organize subcompanies for the purpose of robbing their costockholders or the railroads of part of the profit as, for instance, in the Beef Trust subcompanies are organized, and but few of those in control of the company own and control the stock of the subcompanies. With the Beef Trust the by-products are sold to the subcompany at low prices, thus robbing their costockholders or the trust of part of the profit and for their own special benefit. So with the railroads; those in power and control proceed to organize a company; they call it an express company. They elect themselves to office. The officers or directors are generally a self-perpetuating body. (I quote from the Interstate Commerce Commission's report:)

The directors of this company are a self-perpetuating body, although it is provided in the articles of association and agreement that when shareholders owning two-thirds in amount of the shares of the company shall request it in writing, a meeting of shareholders for the election of directors shall be held. No such meeting has been held since 1862.

Article 8 of the articles of association and agreement reads in part as follows:

But it is hereby expressly understood and agreed that no director herein named and that may hereafter be elected shall be concerned or interested in any business or thing detrimental to the interest of said company or in opposition thereto.

Among the directors of the United States Express Co. are Mr. Stetson, general counsel for the Northern Pacific Railway and Southern Railway, also director of the Chicago-Erie Railroad and the Erie Railroad.

Mr. Weir, director, is chairman of the board of managers of the Adams Express Co. and director in a number of railway companies.

SOUTHERN EXPRESS CO.

One of the directors of the company is M. F. Plant, who is also a director of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, Chicago, Indianapolis & Louisville Railway, and in the Peninsula & Occidental Steamship Co. The number of stockholders is 30.

In the Wells-Fargo Co., by referring to the names of the directors, it will be found that the Erie Railroad and the Harriman lines are strongly represented on the board of directors. The directors of the company on June 30, 1909, were Dudley Evans, F. D. Underwood, E. H. Harriman, J. J. McCook, W. V. S. Thorne, A. K. Vandeventer, William Mahl, F. V. S. Crosby, and H. W. de Forest, all of New York, and H. E. Huntington, George E. Gray, and W. F. Herrin, all of San Francisco, Cal., and J. Kruttschnitt, of Chicago, Ill. Of these, Mr. Underwood was the president of the Erie Railroad and president or director of 80 or more railway and industrial companies; Mr. Harriman then headed the Harriman system of railways; J. J. McCook was of the firm of Alexander & Green, attorneys, and was director in certain insurance and banking concerns; Messrs. Kruttschnitt, Thorne, Van Deventer, Herrin, Mahl, and Crosby were officers of the Harriman lines, while Mr. de Forest was a director of the Southern Pacific Co. Mr. Kruttschnitt was also a director of the Pacific Express Co.

The Western Express Co. has six stockholders. The board of directors June 30 was composed of the following: E. Pennington, W. L. Martin, C. W. Gardner, and H. B. Dike, all of Minneapolis, Minn., and W. F. Fitch, of Marquette, Mich. Of these, Messrs. Pennington, Martin, Dike, and Gardner were officers of the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway and Mr. Fitch was president of the Duluth, South Shore & Atlantic Railway.

In the Pacific Express Co. the number of stockholders is given as 12. On June 30, 1909, the company was controlled through stock ownership by the Missouri Pacific Railway (40 per cent), Union Pacific Railroad (40 per cent), and Wabash Railroad (20 per cent). The directors of this company on June 30, 1909, were James Eggleston, C. S. Clarke, S. B. Schuyler, and E. B. Prior, of St. Louis, Mo.; F. A. Delano and J. Kruttschnitt, of Chicago, Ill.; and Erastus Young, of Omaha, Nebr. Of these, Mr. Clarke and Mr. Schuyler were officers of the Missouri Pacific Railway, Mr. Prior and Mr. Delano of the Wabash Railroad, Mr. Young of the Union Pacific Railroad and the Southern Pacific Co. and director of Wells, Fargo & Co.

In the Northern Express Co. the total number of stockholders is given as six, and the directors are Howard Elliott, J. M. Hannaford, and C. W. Bunn, all of St. Paul, Minn; and J. N. Hill and George H. Earl, both of New York, N. Y., all of whom were officers of the Northern Pacific Railway.

In the National Express Co. the number of shareholders is eight. The directors are Johnston Livingston, Lewis Cass Ledyard, James C. Fargo, Francis F. Flagg, and William C. Fargo, all of New York, N. Y. The first four names are also directors of the American Express Co.

In the Great Northern Express Co. the total number of stockholders is six. This company is controlled by the Lake Superior Co. (Ltd.), through stock ownership. The directors are R. I. Farrington, Louis W. Hill, E. Sawyer, J. M. Gruber, and W. W. Broughton, all of St. Paul, Minn., and all officers of the Great Northern Railway.

In the American Express Co., among its directors are two directors of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, and $3,000,000 of its shares are owned by the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad. James C. Fargo, one of its directors, is also director of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway and the National Express, president and director of the Westcott Express Co. Ledyard, one of its directors, is a director of the Hartford Railroad, Northern Pacific Railroad. Mr. Pratt, one of its directors, is treasurer and director of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and director of the Long Island Railroad, New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad.

ADAMS EXPRESS CO.

The managers of this company (who acted as directors) as of June 30, 1909, were Levi C. Weir, William M. Barrett, Charles Steele, Basil W. Rowe, Dumont Clarke, and George F. Baker, all of New York, and William H. Damsel, of Chicago, Ill.

Mr. Weir was a director of the Des Moines & Fort Dodge Railroad, Iowa Central & Western Railway, Iowa Central Railway, Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad, Norfolk & Western Railway, United Express Co., and also in various steamship, banking, insurance, and land companies.

Mr. Steele was of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., and was a director in a number of railway lines, among them the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway, Central Railroad of New Jersey, Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railway, Erie Railroad, Lehigh Valley Railroad, Northern Pacific Railway, and Southern Railway; and also in various other railway and industrial corporations.

Mr. Rowe was a director in the subsidiary companies of the Adams Express Co. and of the Standard Trust Co.

Mr. Clarke was a member of the board of managers of the Delaware & Hudson Co. and director of the Long Island Railroad, of the Manhattan Railway, and of certain industrial, financial, and insurance companies.

Mr. Baker was a director in the Central Railroad of New Jersey, Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railway, Colorado & Southern Railway, Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad, Erie Railroad, Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway, Lehigh Valley Railroad, Michigan Central Railroad, New York Central & Hudson River Railroad, Northern Pacific Railway, and Pere Marquette Railroad, and also in numerous banking, trust, and industrial companies.

It will be observed that four of the seven managers (directors) were interested in the management of railway lines.

This, I believe, is sufficient to show that the express companies are owned, officered, controlled, and managed by the very men who control, manage, and practically own the railroads; that the express companies are simply subcompanies and a part of the railroads, and it seems unnecessary to state that as long as they get more money from the Government for carrying mail matter or parcels post than they themselves charge for the service that they have no objections to parcels post.

Suppose that you were engaged in the transportation business and your average charge for hauling 100 pounds was $1.54 for collecting, transporting, and delivering and some one came to you and offered you $4 a hundred for simply transporting it and relieved you of part of the service of collecting and delivery as well as part of the responsibility, would you accept or reject such a proposition? You might reject the proposition, but the railroads are not so scrupulous as to stand in their own way or against any such proposition. The high rate paid the railroad companies for carrying mail matter, I take it, accounts for the persistent and concentrated effort put forth by railroads for the establishment of parcels post. And I am not finding fault with the railroads putting forth every possible effort in increasing its revenue, but I object to the railroads putting it on the ground that it is in the interest of the public, and especially those living in the rural districts, and I have pointed out these facts to show that this movement on the part of the railroads is not to benefit the public, but the object sought is to enable the railroads to further drain the Treasury and to enhance its revenue. Be not deceived; railroads are not spending their millions in advertising, in maintaining a lobby in Washington and elsewhere—yes, and electing their own men to Congress and defeating those who are not in accord with their schemes—nor are railroad attorneys instigating contests in election cases in the interest of the public. Like other special and corporate interests, they are without soul and conscience to reckon with. First, last, and all the time the question with them is not to benefit but how to do the public and how their greed and avarice can best be subserved.

What does this extension of the service mean to the railroads? Suppose that through legislation one-eighth of the express business, or, say, only 1,000,000,000 pounds of express, is transferred to the post office. Its pay for carrying the 1,000,000,000 pounds for the Government at the present rate of 4 cents a pound would amount to $40,000,000, as compared with $15,400,000 now received by express companies—a net gain of $24,000,000 to the railroad companies.

If the Government carries the billion pounds at $1.54, the same rate as charged by the express companies, its receipts would be $15,400,000. If it cost the Government, say, 10 cents a pound for handling parcels post—and when you consider that the present average cost of handling mail matter is more than 18 cents a pound, of course it would cost more than 10 cents a pound to handle parcels post, but for the sake of argument we will say that it costs only 10 cents a pound—the total cost then for handling the billion pounds would be $100,000,000; total receipts $15,400,000, or a net loss of $84,600,000. But you say that this is not a fair comparison; that the parcels handled by the Post Office Department are less in weight and much greater in number than those handled by the express companies, and they require more space in cars and help in sorting and handling, and therefore the Government should pay more per pound for carrying mail matter than express companies should pay for carrying express. I admit the first, but not the last. The railroads have nothing to do with sorting mail matter. Mail matter is handed to them in lots from a single letter to trainload lots, the bulk of it in carload lots. Railroads simply carry it, and the Government sorts and looks after it while in transit, and the Government paid last year $19,385,496.51 for railway mail service, or for sorting the mails when in transit. Besides, it paid $1,630,638.48 for transportation of mails in screen wagons, $1,497,971.52 for mail-messenger service, and $810,568.29 for this pneumatic-tube service. Hence, on the one hand the Government pays all expense for sorting, receiving, and delivering mail matter, except at certain points where the railroads do receive and deliver the mail at the post office; on the other hand the express companies carry all sorts of parcels from the domicile in the cities to the station, thence by rail, sort, and deliver at the terminal city. For the Government the railroads perform part of the service of transporting mail, and receive nearly three times the pay per pound that the express companies do for rendering the whole service, and it seems to me that if the express companies can give this service at about one third the rate paid by the Government for part of the service and still make their millions of dollars annually, the rate paid by the Government must be excessive.

WHY THIS EXCESSIVE RATE.

Compare the contracts made by the Government with the railroad companies and those made by the express companies, and you will find that, while the Government gets pay for the actual weight of mail matter only, it enters into an agreement with the railroad companies to pay rent for cars and for carrying all equipments. On the other hand, the express company pays a commission or tonnage on actual weight of packages handled and the railroad companies are required to furnish the express companies with special or exclusive express trains when warranted by the volume of the express traffic. The railroad companies furnish the necessary cars, keep them in good repair, furnish heat and light, and carry the messengers of the express company, as well as the safes, packing trunks, and all necessary equipment, and horses, wagons, and supplies required by express companies may be transported in express cars or shipped by freight. Railroad companies furnish such room in all its depots, stations, and buildings as may be necessary for the loading, unloading, transferring, and storage of express matter, provided the furnishing of such facilities shall not interfere with the business of the railway company. The railroad companies further agree to transmit free of charge the messages to express companies over telegraph lines which the railroad company operates along its line of roads, so far as it may be permitted to do so under its contract with telegraph companies. With all of this extra service, the express companies pay less than one-sixth the rate that this Government pays for part of the service. Will anyone contend that the Government is paying a just rate? With these facts before us, will Congress tolerate this injustice and permit this drain on the Public Treasury to continue? If express rates are high—and there is no doubt in my mind but they are too high—that is an absolute reason for Congress not to increase the rate by extending the postal service until the rate paid by the Government to the railroad companies has been readjusted and the rate made reasonable and fair. If express rates are high they should be reduced, and now that the express companies have been placed under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, same as railroad companies are, there is no excuse for these high rates. If rates are too high it is the duty of the commission to fix a just and reasonable rate.

Gentlemen, the total revenue of all classes of steam roads for the year ending June 30, 1910, was $2,787,266,136.64, an amount equal to about $147 per family in the United States, yet the railroads are not content. They have been clamoring for an increase of 10 per cent freight rates and for parcels post that will give them an increase of 600 per cent in express rates. Every railroad president and every lobbyist who can be employed are working overtime in promoting this scheme, and every inch of space that can be obtained in magazines and newspapers is utilized to this end. The net earnings of the railroads exceed $940,000,000, and if you will make the proper deduction from operating expenses not properly charged to operating expenses and credit that amount to net revenue, the railroads will have a much larger net revenue. It seems to me that the railroad companies ought to be satisfied and that they can get along for a time, at least, without any further increase. To me there seems no necessity for an immediate increase, either in freight rates or express rates.

But is it possible to establish parcels post and make it self-supporting and of any value to the public, even if you reduce the rates paid the railroad companies? If you reduce the pay or the rate 25 per cent, the rate is still about four times as much as the rate paid by the express companies. Cut it 50 per cent and it is still nearly three times the rate paid by express companies, and when you have reduced the rates 2 cents a pound, still the average cost of handling mail matter is 16 cents a pound; and suppose that parcels post cost the Government only half what the present average cost is for handling mail matter, still the cost is five times as great as the rate charged by express companies for carrying express.

Much is said about parcels post in other countries, especially in Germany. Yes, Germany does a parcels-post business on a large scale, but Germany owns its own railroads. The parcels post is a separate business from the post-office business and is carried in separate cars and on separate trains, stored in separate buildings, and they are separate as much as the post-office and express business are here, except there the two are conducted by the Government, while here only one. But Germany, with her dense population, can not be compared with our sparse population. The German Empire has 208,830 square miles, with a population of 58,500,000, or 280 to the square mile. The United States has 3,000,000 square miles, a population of only 92,000,000, or 31 to the square mile.

Of course if the Government owned the railroads it ought to carry freight and express as well as mail matter, but as nearly all countries carrying parcels post own and operate the railroads, and as the United States does not own and operate railroads, except in Panama, no comparison can be made. I will insert in my remarks a communication from the Department of Commerce and Labor, which gives the countries owning and operating railroads:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 4, 1911.

SIR: In compliance with your recent request for information showing the mileage of railroads in leading countries owned and operated by private companies and by the Governments, respectively, I have the honor to inclose herewith a table, copied in the Bureau of Statistics from the thirty-fifth number of the British Statistical Abstract for Foreign Countries, giving these data for the end of the calendar year 1907.

The more important changes in the respective mileage figures since 1907 are due to recent action of several European Governments in extending the mileage of the State owned and operated lines. Thus the Italian Government a few years ago took over the operation of all important national lines, which until then had been leased to three large companies. The extent of the lines operated by the Italian Government on June 30, 1909, was 8,789 miles. On January 1, 1908, the Austrian Government took over some lines owned and operated by private companies. As a result, at the end of the year the mileage of lines operated by the Government, including lines owned and operated as well as lines merely operated by the Government, was 11,105 miles out of a total railroad mileage in Austria on that date of 13,613 miles. Finally, the French Government owns and operates at present, in addition to the 1,758 miles of the so-called "old system" given in the inclosed statement, 3,700 miles, represented by the former French Western Railroad.

On the American Continent the most important change is due to the action of the Mexican Government, taken in the beginning of 1909, in amalgamating the two principal railway systems of the country, the Central and National Railways, into the Ferrocarriles Nacionales de Mexico, and in taking over one-half of the $230,000,000 worth of shares issued after the amalgamation. The operation of the railroads affected remains, however, in the hands of the companies.

Hoping that the inclosed information may prove of service to you, I am, Respectfully, BENJ. S. CABLE, Acting Secretary.

Hon. GILBERT N. HAUGEN, M. C.,

[1] Of the year following.

Data taken from the Statistical Abstract for the Principal and Other Foreign Countries, No. 35, issued by the British Board of Trade, 1910.

Unfortunately, under the rules of the House, any amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill proposing to reduce or readjust the rates would be subject to a point of order, and the only way this matter can be considered and determined is in the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads or the Rules Committee, by bringing in a bill or rule.

I want to avail myself of this opportunity to appeal to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to give this matter most careful consideration, and upon careful investigation I believe it would find it compatible with its duty to report a bill to this House so that this all-important matter may be considered and determined. I believe that justice demands speedy consideration. Congress should fix a just and reasonable rate. Railroads are entitled to such; nothing more and nothing less. Besides, there is a strong sentiment in favor of parcels post, and it is the duty of Congress to investigate and determine whether it can be made self-supporting and beneficial to the public. It must be clear to everybody that if the parcels post is to be established under present conditions, either a heavy draft on the Treasury must be made or the cost of the service to the Government must be materially reduced or the rate of postage must be increased.

Various suggestions have been made as to how this deficit could be made up.

One contention is that the express companies should be prohibited by law from carrying second-class matter, and that would make up a part of the deficit. If it costs the Government, as estimated by the Postmaster General, 9 cents a pound to handle second-class matter and it charges only 1 cent, for every dollar it receives it pays out $9, and is out $8 on every $9 transaction. I do not see how you can increase the net revenue of the department by increasing the second-class mail-matter business. Another contention is the rate on magazines and second-class matter should be increased, and that would increase the net revenue. The present rate on second-class mail matter is 1 cent a pound, yet with that low rate much of the second-class matter is now sent by express, much of it is carried at a half cent a pound; for instance, from Philadelphia to Kansas City, a distance of over a thousand miles, the rate is 50 cents per 100 pounds. If the publishers can save money by shipping magazines and second-class matter by express with the present low rate of 1 cent are they likely to send their publications through the mails when we increase the rate to 4 or 10 cents a pound? The fact that the express companies carry second-class matter at half the rate that the Government does and at one-eighteenth of what it actually costs the Government to carry second-class matter is further evidence that the Government can not, under present conditions, compete with private and corporate interests.

Some have suggested that $40,000,000 can be saved by the discontinuance of the rural free delivery; that $32,000,000 can be saved by discontinuing the city-delivery service. That, of course, is out of the question, and I take it that nobody will seriously suggest that either of the two services shall be discontinued. Others have suggested that franking privileges should be discontinued. Well, as there is only 4,531,080 pounds of franked matter going through the mail, if the average cost is, as estimated by the department, 9 cents a pound, then less than half a million dollars can be saved. That will not go far in making up a probable deficit of $100,000,000. Another suggestion is that the rate on second-class matter shall be increased to the rate which it actually costs the Government for handling second-class matter, which is estimated at 9 cents a pound, and that this would increase the revenue to the extent of $60,000,000.

The policy of Congress has been to disseminate knowledge not only by the distribution of public documents, but by encouraging worthy and legitimate publications—the weekly, the semi-weekly, the dailies, and other periodicals. It has given newspapers and magazines a rate of postage not with a view of making money out of transporting the periodicals, but for the diffusion of knowledge and to promote education and happiness, and in so doing it has had the welfare of our people at heart. Its object has been toward enlightenment and a march onward and upward. Are we now to take a backward step? If so, advance the rate on second-class mail matter and deprive the legitimate and worthy publishers of this low rate and discontinue the distribution of public documents. If this is done, you will undoubtedly reduce the deficit. But can we afford to do it?

Now, one word about establishing a parcels post on rural routes. That has already been provided for. The carrier may carry merchandise for hire on request of patrons residing on their respective routes whenever the same shall not interfere with the proper discharge of their official duties and under such regulation as the postmaster may prescribe. My understanding is that the regulations of the department restrict the carrier to carrying unmailable matter only. The privilege of carrying parcels is left to the discretion of the Postmaster General.

If he will remove these restrictions, or if Congress will provide that all parcels shall be carried by the rural carrier for hire, and, if necessary, fix a maximum rate, the service can be had at a much lower rate than the one proposed, and these people can be just as well accommodated. This privilege was granted carriers at first and until Congress and the Postmaster General placed restrictions on the carriers, which was done with a view of insuring the people living in the rural districts a better service. It goes without saying that a carrier carrying a light load can and will give better and more prompt service than one carrying a heavy load, and for that reason the restrictions were made. Under present arrangements the carriers may, when requested by the patrons residing on the route, carry packages of any weight (all proposed amendments limit the weight of parcels to 11 pounds); if so, instead of expanding the service the result would be, if proposed legislation is enacted, to contract the service instead of expanding it.

If additional packages are to be carried the carrier's compensation should be increased. Under the present arrangement the carrier gets the fee and therefore has no claim on the Government. But if the parcels are to be carried and the fee paid the Government, the carrier will have a just claim for an increase of salary, and of course would demand it, and in justice to him his salary would have to be increased. In my opinion the increase of salary would largely exceed the increase in receipts. If the Postmaster General does not care to assume the responsibility of impairing the service by extending it through the removal of these restrictions, Congress can do it, if in its judgment it is deemed advisable. But the contention is that this arrangement will not reduce the deficit. Why should the farmer and country storekeeper make up a deficit not caused by him, but which is due to other causes, such as the carrying of certain mail matter at a loss, especially second-class matter, the franking privilege, and the exorbitant rates paid railroad companies?

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is closed under the order of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. Only the general debate to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is closed, but debate under the five-minute rule is now in order.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Was not the order of the House to the effect that the point of order should come after all debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the gentleman from Ohio is in control as to when the decision shall be called for on the point of order. At present the point of order is reserved, and the proceedings will be under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is the paragraph subject to amendment pending the reservation?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the point of order be either withdrawn or made.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I, too, think it ought either to be made or withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio insist upon his point of order?

Mr. KEIFER. I think the provision is subject to a point of order. I think the arrangement was that the debate was to be concluded, and then we would see. I think the notes will show that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that the items in the bill are not in order, not being authorized by law.

Mr. TAWNEY. The understanding was that at the conclusion of general debate of two hours an opportunity would be given for debate under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The recollection of the Chair is, although the present occupant was not in the chair at the time, that unanimous agreement was for two hours' general debate, and at the end of that time the paragraphs should be considered in the usual manner under the five-minute rule. The point of order being pending, it is to be disposed of at the demand of any member of the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. And must necessarily be disposed of before the items are opened to amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I assume that the Chair has examined the Spooner Act, which is the only general act under which these items are authorized.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not understand that it is necessary to refer to the Spooner Act to find out whether the Pacific seacoast defense is to be provided for in the paragraph just read. In the first place the Spooner Act does not provide for anything more than is provided for in the treaty, a paragraph of which I have recently read, giving the right to the United States to neutralize and the provision against blockading and the right to protect it against lawlessness and disaster. If the act provides for a violation of existing treaties the act is nugatory, and it antedates the neutralization provided for in the treaty with Panama. And there are two other reasons, Mr. Chairman. One is that we propose now by this provision to empower the War Department, through its fortification board, as appears by the matter sent here from the Quartermaster General, forwarded by the President, which shows that the work proposed is to be done by the War Department independently of the commission that the President has been authorized to appoint for the construction of the canal.

Moreover, there has been no appropriation made for many years under the Spooner Act. Why? Because we have been obliged to reenact the power that the President is to exercise under each one of the appropriation bills from year to year. This bill contains the same provision—authorizing the construction and use of the money in accordance with that act, that having exhausted itself in various ways. If the chairman has the act before him he will see that it was exhausted as soon as we had appropriated not to exceed $139,000,000. Let me read:

Section 5 of the Spooner Act: And the President is hereby authorized to cause to be entered into such contract or contracts as may be deemed necessary for the proper excavation, construction, completion, and defense of said canal and harbors and by the route finally authorized by and under the provisions of this act. Appropriations therefor shall from time to time be hereafter made not to exceed in the aggregate the additional sum of $135,000,000 if the Panama route be adopted, and $180,000,000 should the Nicaragua route be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Ohio inform the Chair whether the limit of authorization has not been increased since that time?

Mr. KEIFER. Never, except as we increased it annually.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, yes.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman has a statute that shows it, then I am mistaken. We have annually in this same bill increased it, because we have made this extension to it and nothing more. Gentlemen say, "Oh, yes;" but if they can not refer me to a statute increasing such authorization, I must insist that there is none.

Mr. TAWNEY. If my colleague will permit me——

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like to ask whether he considers the authorization in the tariff act for a bond issue as authorizing the increased cost of the canal?

Mr. KEIFER. That does not affect the question of the cost of the canal any further than it may furnish what is necessary to carry it on. The Spooner Act exhausted itself long ago. There is no doubt about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am told there is a limit of cost fixed in the Payne-Aldrich bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not before him the act increasing the limit of cost. The Chair recollects when the lock type of canal was agreed upon that there was an increase in the limit of cost, and if not, it was, the Chair thinks, when the Payne tariff bill was passed. The Chair would like to be informed when the lock type of canal was agreed upon. The Chair's recollection is that the limit of cost was increased to $375,000,000.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, this is important enough to get the act and try to find out.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The Payne tariff bill did increase the amount of bonds beyond the limit of cost fixed in the special act, but I call the Chair's attention to what I understand to be the well-settled parliamentary rule of law, that even though there was no law when Congress passed the first appropriation increasing it, authorizing that increase, yet the passage of that law was such an abandonment of the limit of cost that further appropriations could be made for it as for a work in progress, even though the amount was in excess of the limit fixed. I think there are a number of decisions to that effect.

Mr. KEIFER. No such rule as that applies in any parliamentary body that I ever heard of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not the act before him, but the Chair feels quite confident that the limit of cost was increased up to $375,000,000, and the Chair would like to be informed as to that fact.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand we have appropriated something in the neighborhood of $400,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not that much.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio this: Suppose the limit of cost to have been fixed at $375,000,000 in some act of Congress. I understand the gentleman to say that Congress has since appropriated enough more to make the amount $400,000,000. Does not the appropriation of $25,000,000 more amount to a repeal of that limitation of cost?

Mr. KEIFER. Only to the extent of the twenty-five millions.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is not the ruling.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the Chair that there is still another ground for the fortification of this canal. It is the property of the United States of America, and the same right that we have to fortify the Philippines or Alaska or the Hawaiian Islands applies also to the Panama Canal.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no. Neither the Philippines nor Alaska are or can be neutralized as the Panama Canal is by existing treaties, and can be further neutralized by a general international treaty with the principal powers of the world.

Mr. TAWNEY. The total appropriations for the Panama Canal are $248,001,458.58, and to that there should be added the appropriation carried in this bill of $45,560,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty of April 19, 1850, contains this provision in Article I:

> The Governments of Great Britain and the United States hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, etc.

For many years there were bills pending, some of which were reported, in reference to the construction of an isthmian canal, a number of them relating in recent years to the Nicaraguan Canal in aid of the Maritime Canal Co. On December 12, 1898, the Hon. William F. Hepburn, who was then the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the committee of this House which had jurisdiction of legislation relating to the Isthmian Canal, introduced a bill which for the first time proposed that the Government itself should construct the canal. That bill provided, among other things, that the President of the United States—> be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire by purchase from the States of Costa Rica and Nicaragua full ownership * * * of certain territory on which to excavate, construct, and defend a canal of such depth and capacity, etc.

That was at the third session of the Fifty-fifth Congress. At the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, on December 7, 1899, Mr. Hepburn introduced another bill to the same effect, that the President, and so forth, be authorized to acquire territory on which to excavate, construct, and defend a canal of such depth and capacity. Following the introduction of that bill on the 5th of February, 1900, a treaty was signed by Mr. Hay and Sir Julian Pauncefote, commonly known as the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which referred to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as follows:

> The United States of America and Her Majesty, the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, etc., being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to that end to remove any objections that may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in Article VIII of that convention, etc.

Among other provisions in this Hay-Pauncefote treaty was this in Article II:

> The high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle" of neutralization established in Article VIII of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, adopt as the basis of such neutralization the following rules.

It will be noticed that this article places the responsibility for maintaining the principle of neutralization not upon the United States alone, but upon the United States and Great Britain. Paragraph 7 of Article II of that treaty contains this provision:

> No fortification shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

When that treaty was submitted to the Senate of the United States various amendments were suggested in the Senate, but in the end the treaty was not ratified by either party. Following the sending of that message to the Senate of the United States and its consideration in the Senate on May 3, 1900, Col. Hepburn introduced this bill:

> A bill to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.
> That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire from the States of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, for and in behalf of the United States, control of such portion of territory now belonging to Costa Rica and Nicaragua as may be desirable and necessary on which to excavate, construct, and protect a canal of such depth and capacity, etc.

Here were bills pending in Congress, one of which was reported before the treaty had been agreed upon and ratified between the United States and Great Britain abrogating the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, providing that the United States should construct and defend or protect a canal. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not contain a provision directly abrogating the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. There was then before the two countries a proposition presented by a legislative committee of this House having control of the subject, a proposition that the United States should construct and defend or protect an Isthmian canal and a provision that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty could be, if not abrogated, changed to allow that.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was finally ratified, contained a provision that the high contracting parties agree that the present treaty—that is, the last Hay-Pauncefote treaty—shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, therefore, is entirely abrogated. Article III of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides that the United States, not the United States and Great Britain, but the United States adopts as a basis of neutralization of such ship canal the following rules substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople of October 28, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal. That is to say, the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions, of charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

And there are various other rules. Article II of that treaty provides that—

> The canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money by individuals, etc.

And that—subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the United States shall have and enjoy the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Paragraph 2 of Article III provides:

The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

And the provision which was in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, "that no fortification shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent," was deliberately left out of the treaty which was ratified.

The present occupant of the chair has endeavored to read all of the correspondence which has been published in any form upon this subject, and has no hesitation in saying that in his opinion it was the design in the treaty to leave to the Government of the United States the right to determine how it should police the canal, and what regulations it should make.

Following the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was ratified in November, 1901, came an act of Congress based upon the Hepburn bill, which had passed the House and for which a substitute was made in the Senate. That act, commonly known as the Spooner Act, is the act of June 28, 1902. It provided:

That the President is hereby authorized to acquire from the Republic of Colombia, for and on behalf of the United States, upon such terms as he may deem reasonable, perpetual control of a strip of land, the territory of the Republic of Colombia, not less than 6 miles in width, and extending from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, and the right to use and dispose of the waters thereon, and to excavate, construct, and to perpetually maintain, operate, and protect thereon, a canal of such depth and capacity, etc.

Another provision of that act is section 5, reading:

That the President is hereby authorized to cause to be entered into such contract or contracts as may be deemed necessary for the proper excavation, construction, completion, and defense of said canal, harbors, and defenses, by the route finally determined upon under the provisions of this act.

The route finally determined upon was the Panama Canal route, and it is said that the convention or treaty entered into between the United States and Panama would not permit the United States to fortify the canal.

Article XVIII of the treaty between the United States and Panama provides:

The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened under the terms provided for in section 1 of Article III of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by Great Britain and the Government of the United States October 18, 1901.

But the neutralization under the treaty (the Hay-Pauncefote treaty) is to be maintained by the United States, not by the United States and Great Britain.

It is said that the limit of cost has been exceeded. The original limit of cost for the canal was based upon the estimate of the engineers, but when Congress adopted the lock-type of canal at the time it did, it was well known that the original limit of cost would be exceeded.

The chairman is not now certain what provision was made at that time in reference to the limit of cost, but in the Payne tariff bill it was provided, among other things, in reference to the issuance of bonds, that there might be issued the additional sum of $290,569,000 of bonds, which sum, together with the $84,631,900 already borrowed by the issuance of 2 per cent bonds under section 8 of the act of June 28, 1902, equals the estimate of the Isthmian Canal Commission of the amount required to cover the entire cost of the canal from its inception to its completion; and if there be no other change of authorization it is quite certain that the adoption of this estimate by the authority to issue bonds to cover the estimate of cost would be, of itself, an adoption of the estimate.

The Chair personally has been very much at sea in reference to the desirability of fortifying the canal, but in deciding the point of order the Chair does not pass upon that in any respect. It seems to the Chair that whereas it is provided that the United States shall preserve the neutrality of the canal for the benefit of all nations alike, and that the United States shall provide military police upon the canal to preserve it from disorder, and whereas Congress has provided that the Government shall construct, maintain, operate, and protect the canal, it is quite within the power of the House to determine in what way it should be protected, and whether fortifications are necessary. If fortifications are necessary for protection, then the items in the bill are in order. [Applause.] The Chair therefore overrules the point of order. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the item of $2,000,000 for the construction of seacoast batteries has already been read. I wish to offer an amendment to the next paragraph, if I am right in my conclusion. I send the amendment to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the next paragraph in the bill, as follows:

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of seacoast cannon for coast defense, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $1,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for those lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, we have not passed the first one, unless you couple them together.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to submit an amendment with reference to the first paragraph?

Mr. KEIFER. I have no objection to leaving the matter open until I am allowed to make the motion to strike out both paragraphs. But if I am to be kept off on that, I will make a motion as to the first one. If I can have the right to make the motion applicable to both paragraphs, I would prefer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio desires to have the two paragraphs treated as one.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does that propose to consider both paragraphs as one?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be treated as one paragraph, unless there is objection. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEIFER. Then I ask that the Chair consider a motion pending to strike out both paragraphs with that understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will have opportunity at the proper time. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

The Clerk read the amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Iowa, as follows:

On page 229, strike out lines 15 to 18, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For the purchase, manufacture, and test of seacoast cannon for coast defense, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipment, and machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, to cost ultimately not to exceed $1,966,000, $1,000,000; the same to be immediately available and to continue available until expended."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this amendment does not increase the limit of cost.

Mr. KEIFER. I think that is subject to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I make the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is not subject to a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, is not that legislation fixing the ultimate limit of cost?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is fixing the amount as originally proposed, but within the limit of cost.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is fixing legislation limiting the cost.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If any gentleman wants to take the responsibility of raising a point of order on the fixing of the limit of cost, he can make it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, that simply fixes the same amount as in the bill, but limits the cost and the amount estimated to this particular purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, is the vote now to be taken on the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question and make a suggestion. In the first place, if we enter upon the policy of fortifying the canal, we must fortify it most thoroughly, and I want to know upon what basis of cost and efficiency of fortification this limitation is predicated.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the committee may well allow this amendment to be adopted in order to perfect the section, but I will explain to the gentleman that the board went to Panama, and there made as careful an estimate as possible of the entire cost of this work. This $1,966,000 is an estimate for the heavy guns and carriages and the like. Now, it is believed by the Chief of Ordnance that he has no right to enter upon a work that will cost more than the appropriation without the limit being fixed, and the purpose is simply to fix, at exactly the estimate for this work, the limit of cost.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It seems to me that it is impossible for anybody, expert or otherwise, to determine the cost of the necessary fortifications for that canal when we undertake that work.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not see why it is not possible to do it just as well as to estimate the cost of anything else. A very competent board has been down there and made the best estimate they can. They may be mistaken in it, but as far as I am concerned, I propose to take the estimate of these men rather than to take my own.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My motion is that we ought to do this work thoroughly if we enter upon it, and let that be the limitation.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This estimate is only to let him begin that part of the work which he estimates for.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He must do it all within this limitation.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, no; this is not to complete the work, but only for the work that he starts on.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I supposed that covered the whole cost of the fortifications, and I thought we were getting off very cheap. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, there was a statement made by the chairman of the committee, Mr. MANN, that I do not agree to. The chairman stated a little while ago that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I hardly ever heard that before until it was stated this evening. The first article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty says nothing of the kind, but says the present treaty, that is the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, was to be taken in lieu of that which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provided for in two places—that the neutralization of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is to be retained and continued to perpetually neutralize the canal.

Another statement has just been made that a board of competent people was sent down to Panama to make a report about the cost of fortifying and blockading the canal, and that they had reported that it would cost so much. That board reported a rather comprehensive scheme for an army and navy establishment, but it did not report an estimate cost of its completion. It first reported something over $19,000,000 to start the military part of it, and after being requested to cut this preliminary estimate down, it reduced it to twelve million and something more to do a portion of the estimated initial cost. The board in its report says:

> The following table gives the estimate of cost for the defense contemplated by the board for the necessary accessories, for the construction of posts, for preparation of camp site, but does not include the cost of construction for naval purposes.

Down at the bottom of its report this language is used:

> The board records its opinion that the naval estimates, provided with such facilities as the Navy Department shall consider necessary, are an essential part of the defense of the canal and should be provided equally with the projected land force.

Now, what does the Navy want? What do they recommend? They recommend two harbors, one at either end of the canal, where there is no harbor at all and excavations can not be made, and protection for these harbors can not be made at a cost less than $100,000,000.

The board also provides in its report that there shall be two naval stations; that there shall be dry docks; that there shall be a multitude of things that would require more than $100,000,000 to complete. Let us not shut our eyes to the fact that we are simply being drawn into vast expenditures by a proposition to provide a little seacoast defense to start with. I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that if we are to fortify this canal against the world, that it should be done right. Let us go in with the understanding that we are to put in $100,000,000 now and provide more battleships and more Army to protect it or we will lose it in the end. Mr. TAWNEY has given a fair estimate of the cost of maintaining the proposed fortifications. I am in favor of doing this thing right, if at all, and not do a little chipmunk work down there and lose the canal. [Laughter.] That is the point I make, that it must be fortified or not fortified. Neutralization will protect and preserve the Panama Canal to the United States in perpetuity. At the risk of some repetition I submit, somewhat at length, a reply to things said here and elsewhere to justify the abandonment of the long existing policy of the United States to neutralize the canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

REPLY TO CERTAIN STATEMENTS.

The statements made in debate here and in the public prints to justify a violation of existing treaties by which the United States is bound with other nations to neutralize the Panama Canal must be excused, if at all, because their authors have not had time or opportunity to examine the treaties and have accepted what was stated by persons who supposed they possessed knowledge on the subject and were possessed of an overdesire to enlarge the Army and Navy in time of peace.

Some of the statements are made as though the neutralization of the Panama Canal by international treaty had some relation to the neutralization of forts and strongholds of nations established as a means of protecting them. They do not seem to understand that the canal is to be a public carrier of the commerce of the world, on which tolls are to be collected—the only possible source of revenue to its owner.

When the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] asks why Russia did not neutralize Port Arthur, or why the Japanese have not undertaken "to strengthen its defense through neutralization," and why the British "have not neutralized Gibraltar," we are bound to assume that he spoke without reflection. Nothing is more plainly absurd than to suppose any one nation can alone neutralize its own territory or property, unless, possibly, it is more absurd to suppose that fortified places purely for national defense, like Gibraltar, could be neutralized by international treaty or otherwise. War conditions and neutralization can not exist together. The one excludes the other. There is likewise no possible reason for one nation to neutralize a military or naval stronghold of another, if that were possible.

Mr. distinguished friend [Mr. HOBSON] also says: "The entrance to the Suez Canal is at Gibraltar." Gibraltar is about 2,400 miles from Port Said, the Mediterranean entrance to the Suez Canal, and Gibraltar is about 300 miles more distant from that entrance than the fortifications of New York Harbor are from Colon, the Atlantic entrance to the Panama Canal.

He and others say the Suez Canal is fortified. This statement is absolutely unwarranted. All around me are men who have been through it and can speak from personal knowledge. The Suez Canal treaty of 1888 guarantees its neutralization and nonfortification, and that treaty has never been, and never will be, violated. And so as to all such treaties. Whatever fortifications the British, French, Turkish, or other Governments have in or along the Mediterranean or the Red Sea or their connecting waters are for purposes other than to fortify the canal, and have no more relation to fortifying, blockading, or protecting the Suez Canal than has Gibraltar, or the fortifications at New York City, New Orleans, or San Francisco have to the Panama Canal.

There has not been one dollar spent by any of the signatory powers to the Suez Canal treaty to fortify or to protect it from harm. In all cases, as I have on a former occasion shown, where property, seas, navigable rivers, or straits have been neutralized, all military forts and war preparations, if any before existed, as on the Danube, Black Sea, and so forth, have been torn down and forbidden.

He says the British did not regard the neutralization of the Suez Canal in 1878. The treaty of neutralization bears date October 29, 1888, 10 years later.

Another Member, Mr. KOPP, of Wisconsin, has made a like mistake in his speech on the same subject. There is not time to point out and answer much else of like character.

Mr. HOBSON, somewhat defiantly, exclaimed here in speaking of the Suez Canal treaty, that—> in that treaty the word used is that the contracting powers "agree" and not "guarantee." The British insisted on striking out the word "guarantee."

He should have read the treaty before announcing such an erroneous statement.

Its opening sentence reads:

> Guarantee of the free use of said canal by all the powers, and providing that it shall not be fortified or blockaded, and that it shall be open in time of war as in time of peace.

My distinguished friend, Mr. MILLER of Kansas, in a talk here had the misfortune, when referring to the treaty with Panama of November 18, 1903, to refer or quote only Article XXIII thereof, which article has no reference to the neutralization of the canal at all, but only, as he then said, to a right that existed without any stipulation, namely, to protect it "if it should become necessary," a right nobody and no treaty has ever denied, but all treaties provide for. He wholly, though requested, neglected to refer to Articles XVIII and XXV of the same treaty, which in explicit terms provide for its neutralization, as stipulated in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which adopts and applies to the Panama Canal the neutralization embodied in both the Clayton-Bulwer and Suez Canal treaties. Articles XVIII and XXV will be quoted later.

He makes an ineffectual attempt to have it appear that President Hayes alone of the Presidents from Monroe to President Taft had opposed the neutralization of the canal. He quoted from a message of President Hayes of March 8, 1880, which had no reference to its neutralization, but only to its control by the United States, and he fails to quote President Hayes's later annual message of December 6, 1880, in which he, following his great Secretary of State, Mr. Evarts, recognized with approval that the United States, by its treaty obligations with Colombia, was bound to forever "guarantee the neutrality" of any canal or transit line of any character in the Isthmus of Panama, I have quoted his language in my January 19, 1911, speech delivered here.

He and others pretend to think that the great preparations for war in foreign countries through enlarged armies and navies are a sufficient reason for the United States to, in violation of treaty obligations, erect fortifications on the canal, enlarge our Army and Navy, and to prepare for war on and around it, rather than to have its safety guaranteed by the powers of the world.

The more danger from strong armed forces of other nations there may be the more reason there is for effectual neutralization.

There are some persons here and elsewhere who say existing law authorizes the fortification of the Panama Canal. It does not. But Congress can not set aside an international treaty or make legal its violation. This is hardly as rational an excuse for the United States to violate the guaranteed neutralization of the canal as the one so often used, based on the claim that the United States ought to promptly violate its treaty obligations and sacrifice its pledged national honor for fear some other nation will not observe its like obligations, honor, and good faith.

Still others say the United States alone is bound to neutralize the Panama Canal, and therefore it can do as it pleases about it—that is, the greater the obligations it has assumed in relation to the canal the less it is bound to fulfill them. How ridiculous!

Such attempts are never convincing. They only demonstrate the desperation advocates of war and war measures are driven to resort to.

And, surprisingly, men of distinction, when forced to admit that existing treaties neutralize the canal and prohibit its fortification and blockade, have put forth the theory that fortifications are, notwithstanding, justified to prevent a foreign country from blockading the canal, as though blockade could come from without. This is the weakest attempt to find an excuse for violating the treaties yet mentioned. It is analogous to a man who, fearing that burglars might break and enter his house to steal, proposes to protect his property by keeping a strong police at his front and back doors to keep them open so the burglars could safely enter without breaking.

MONROE DOCTRINE.

There are still persons who assert that neutralization violates the Monroe doctrine and is unpatriotic. The Monroe doctrine, proclaimed by Monroe in 1823, has reference only to European nations not interfering with American Republics, and not to matters of an international character relating to commerce.

The action of the United States Senate in 1835 and of the House of Representatives in 1839 in passing neutralization resolutions, and the Senate in ratifying neutralization treaties with European countries, and the advocacy by Presidents Monroe, John Quincy Adams, Andrew Jackson, Polk, Taylor, Fillmore, Buchanan, Lincoln, Grant, Hayes, Garfield, Harrison, Cleveland, McKinley, and Roosevelt; also by Webster, Clay, Clayton, Everett, Evarts, Blaine, Hay, and other great statesmen in advocation of treaties of neutralization with European powers, show they did not regard them in violation of the Monroe doctrine, or as unpatriotic.

NEUTRALIZATION—WHAT IT IS.

The Panama Canal is neutralized by the treaty of 1846 with New Granada, now Colombia, by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November 18, 1901, which includes the neutralization of the Clayton-Bulwer and Suez Canal treaties; by the treaty with the Republic of Panama of November, 1903, and by the requirements of the franchise granted by New Granada May 17, 1878, purchased by the United States of the New Panama Canal Co.—the French company—April 23, 1903.

These treaties are now in full force, and the United States in taking over said franchise, which now constitutes its only warrant to build the Panama Canal at all, became bound by its terms of neutralization. And the canal can be neutralized by a general international treaty.

Those who contend the United States should fortify the Panama Canal do so because they seem to believe neutralization by international treaty will not safeguard it from seizure or destruction by some nation; that strategically it should be closed when the United States is at war; that neutralization is not operative in a state of war in which the United States is engaged; that an international guaranty could or would not be enforced by the guarantors.

Some pretend to believe such treaties are not always observed, and that this constitutes a sufficient reason for the United States to violate its national honor by breaking them. Such belief is entertained without information or reflection. And recent rules and regulations of war adopted by 42 of the nations of the earth prohibits a belligerent from firing on or destroying undefended, nonfortified property of the enemy. These rules and regulations were adopted in 1907 at The Hague Conference, and the United States then signed them, and it has since ratified and proclaimed them as of binding force. So have other nations.

But, first, what is meant by neutralization?

Neutralization when applied to a property in public use like the Panama Canal has never accomplished and never could, and never was intended to accomplish any purpose unless its owner was at war or apprehended war. Then it exempts neutralized property from war, and the exigencies of war.

In times of peace or of war, when its owner is not a belligerent, it is wholly unnecessary, as such property is respected without it. The seizure or injury of the canal by a belligerent would itself be a declaration of war against the guarantors of its neutrality. No nation already at war would, or ever did, violate an international treaty guaranteeing the neutralization of property it was permitted to enjoy, whether at war with its owner or not.

Neutralization can have no application when and where it is not needed. It admits of no combined conditions of peace and war. It is a jealous mistress of peace. When the United States is not at war, the Panama Canal needs no neutralization. Then vessels of commerce and of war will, unmolested, pass in and out of it as they do in times of peace in all our harbors. Neutralization of the canal will except it at all times from war conditions. It accomplishes that object and no other. When long ago—1850—a canal across the Isthmus was talked about as a possibility, the United States and Great Britain agreed to guarantee its neutralization in perpetuity, though neither then owned or expected to own or have any interest in it or any sovereignty over the territory through which it might be built. Their guaranty then was and now is of absolute freedom from war and all war conditions in time of war, regardless of the belligerents engaged.

The United States can not alone neutralize its own property; that is impossible. The United States can not neutralize its own territory or any part thereof in time of peace; it then needs no neutralization.

Our predecessors and the great men of other times and lands understood exactly what neutralization meant, and at no time in history has it been supposed that a nation could neutralize its own territory or property. Who could complain of a withdrawal or a violation of such attempt at neutrality?

Neutralization means something. The first consequence of the neutralization of the Danube—1865-1818—was to raze all forts and to remove all guns and troops from its banks; and the neutralization—1817—of our great northern lakes resulted in no ship of war ever thereafter being placed thereon and no fort or gun being erected on its shores for the protection of the American coast and the cities thereon from a foreign foe.

So as to other neutralized property or water highways.

Neutralization is to exempt from war, or acts of war—to secure peace; it has no application to a state of peace, only to preserve it.

When at peace the canal enjoys neutralization naturally.

Other nations at war will always respect the canal, either as required under universally recognized international law or under the recently adopted rules and regulations of war. Neutralization, fortifications, or blockade are therefore wholly unnecessary and inapplicable, save to protect the canal when the United States is at war.

Obviously, in such case, if not bound by such law or rules and regulations, a belligerent would not invite war with the United States by wantonly attacking the canal. A nation at war with one nation does not provoke war with another. The neutralization provided for the canal in all the treaty and other obligations has reference only and strictly to a state of war in which the United States is a belligerent. The stipulations in the treaties granting free access and ingress of vessels of commerce and of war of foreign nations relate to mere matters of comity and interest in securing on reasonable and equitable terms revenue to the United States, and are only incident to neutralization. The neutralization of the Panama Canal is not like the neutralization of a country, not to be used or enjoyed by the guarantors or other nations, but which is to be enjoyed alone by the people of the neutralized country.

The statement that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was modified to secure the right of the United States to own land through which a canal could be built, and to "regain the power to fortify the canal, which it had parted with in 1850," has no support in fact.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 never took from the United States a right to fortify any canal. It neither then, theretofore, nor since enjoyed, nor did it then or ever seek to enjoy, such right.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was a mutual agreement between Great Britain and the United States that neither of them would—ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over any ship canal, agreeing that neither would ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof.

The canal then in contemplation, as stated in the treaty, was "by the way of the river San Juan de Nicaragua," through one or both of Lakes Nicaragua or Managua, and wholly in Nicaragua territory. Neither Great Britain nor the United States then had any ownership or proprietary interest in or right of any kind to build or fortify any canal when built. The treaty was an advance pledge that neither of these countries would ever acquire or assume any such right; and coupled with this pledge was a guaranty that if the canal was built "by any parties having the authority of the local governments through whose territory the same may pass," it should be neutralized, never fortified or blockaded. At that time, and for more than 50 years thereafter, neither Great Britain nor the United States owned or permanently controlled any territory in Central America. Article VIII of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty stated that the neutrality and protection provided in it for the Nicaraguan route might be extended to any other practicable route by canal or railway across the Isthmus of Panama.

In both the 1900 and the 1901 Hay-Pauncefote treaties it is recited that both the United States and Great Britain—being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the United States, without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in Article VIII of that convention.

President McKinley, in submitting for ratification the one dated February 5, 1900, and President Roosevelt on February 22, 1902, in proclaiming the ratification of the one dated November 18, 1901, used the same language in substance in declaring the purpose of the respective treaties. Not one word was said in either treaty or by either President or by anybody on the subject of securing to the United States the right to own land through which a canal could be built; and both treaties provided for the neutralization of any canal the United States might build as stipulated for in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, also according to the rules governing the neutralization of the Suez Canal established by the convention of Constantinople of date of October 28, 1888. Both treaties in express terms neutralize the canal and prohibit blockade and fortifications, and require it to be—free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations.

When the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty (1900) was signed, and later (Dec. 16, 1900) when it was ratified, the United States had not acquired or sought to acquire any right to any territory over which to build a canal across the Isthmus.

At the time the 1901 treaty was signed and ratified the United States had acquired a conditional right merely to build a canal through Nicaraguan territory, but without attempting to acquire any sovereignty over any territory proposed to be occupied. It did not acquire its present right to the Canal Zone until after November 18, 1903, nor was the President authorized to acquire any territory over which to build a canal until June 28, 1902. As showing conclusively that there was no purpose on the part of the United States to acquire the right to fortify the canal it might build, a clause in paragraph 7 of Article III of the 1900 treaty expressly prohibited fortification in these words:

No fortification shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent.

President McKinley and his great Secretary, John Hay, favored this clause and asked the Senate to ratify it, and the Senate, by a large majority on several yea and nay votes, refused to strike this prohibition out of the treaty or to modify it.

In the 1901 treaty it was thought best and safest to remove all doubt as to what the United States might do or not do toward protecting the canal, to specifically define what it was empowered to do. So, for paragraph 7 of Article III of the older treaty this language was used:

The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

This clause fully recognized that the neutralization provisions of the treaty prohibited all acts of or preparations for war, and hence there was used the language "The United States, however," meaning that, notwithstanding such provisions and prohibition, the United States might "be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder;" nothing more.

This limited its separate military and police power. Whatever right not thereby granted was, of course, excluded. Having defined the power reserved or granted to the United States, no other could be exercised under the treaty. And we shall soon see that the Senate of the United States, in ratifying each of the Hay-Pauncefote treaties, understood fully that each prohibited fortifications on the canal.

The provision was made a part of section 2, Article III, of this treaty as a substitute for the clause in section 7 of the 1900 Hay-Pauncefote treaty expressly to prevent the misunderstandings apprehended by the British authorities if they ratified the earlier Hay-Pauncefote treaty as amended by the Senate. The provision was not to weaken but to retain and strengthen the neutralization of the canal, so much desired, as stated in the correspondence, by both countries.

The whole section reads:

The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any act of war be exercised, nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

It would not be excusable to again refer to the nature of the treaties and the settled rules for their construction if those who favor violating the plain provisions of neutralization in the several treaties did not attempt to justify themselves by insisting that under them the United States may do what is not in them expressly prohibited, even though other provisions of the treaties would be overthrown thereby. As for instance blockade of the canal is expressly prohibited, yet it is insisted the canal may be fortified, though to fortify it will absolutely blockade it.

The same rules of construction apply to treaties as to other compacts.

An express exception only saves a general provision from being exclusive.

The Supreme Court has spoken on this subject:

A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations. It depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the intent and the honor of the governments which are parties to it. (118 U. S., 598.)

In its construction the same rules which govern other compacts properly apply. (9 How., 127.) There is no rule of interpretation applicable to treaties or to private contracts which would authorize either of the parties to make exceptions by construction, where the parties have not thought proper to make them. (8 Wheat., 464, 488, 489; 12 Pet., 722.)

As indicative of the accepted rule of interpretation of treaties, the language of Mr. Justice Field (133 U. S., 271) is significant:

It is a general principle of construction with respect to treaties that they shall be liberally construed, so as to carry out the intention of the parties.

Manifestly the draftsmen of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty understood the meaning of language, used it properly, and were familiar with the rules of construction.

While the 1900 treaty was pending for ratification in the Senate on December 1, 1900, President McKinley, through Secretary Hay, negotiated a protocol with Nicaragua by which it agreed to settle a plan by which the United States might build a canal through Nicaraguan territory, the United States expressly agreeing therein that it should be neutralized as stipulated in the 1900 Hay-Pauncefote treaty then pending for ratification in the United States Senate. Such treaty, as stated, in terms prohibited fortifications.

When President Roosevelt sent to the Senate for ratification the 1901 Hay-Pauncefote treaty, he and Secretary Hay understood that the language defining the powers the United States might exercise to protect the canal excluded fortifications and blockade, and they made this clear to the Senate. The President in his letter of transmittal forcefully stated that the treaty was concluded with a view to preserve the—

General principle of neutralization embodied as the settled policy of the United States Government in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty more than 50 years before.

Neutralization and nonfortification were central and principal provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The Senators had the same understanding, and they accordingly voted down every effort to take out of the 1901 treaty such prohibition, and likewise voted down by large majorities every motion to amend it so as to secure to the United States the right to fortify the canal, even though built wholly at its expense. They understood neutralization, fortifications, and blockade could not go together.

All the treaties require neutralization and prohibit blockade or acts of war, and if they contained no other stipulations, fortifications could not be established under them, and the fortifications proposed by the Fortification Board mean only blockade, which is expressly prohibited in all the treaties.

Since the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated in February, 1900, nothing was done by the United States to secure the right to fortify the canal when built, save by a few Senators whose efforts failed. Even the amendment to the first treaty which caused its rejection by Great Britain did not provide any right, at any time, to fortify the canal. It purposely left paragraph 7 of Article III unaffected which, we have just seen, prohibited fortifying the canal. President McKinley and Secretary Hay December 1, 1900, after the first treaty was signed and before its ratification was acted on, negotiated with Nicaragua for the mere right to build a canal through its territory.

So it clearly was not the purpose in making any Hay-Pauncefote treaty to acquire the right to secure land through which to construct a canal or to fortify it when built.

The statement that the correspondence between Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Hay, and Mr. Hay's statement to the Senate in transmitting the treaty finally ratified shows that it was recognized by both parties to the treaty that the neutrality of the canal was to be maintained alone by the United States; that nothing in the treaty would prevent the United States fortifying the canal, and that in case of war between the United States and England or other country, nothing in the treaty would prevent the United States from closing the canal to shippers of an enemy, and that the Senate insisted on these things, is unwarranted. No fact supports it. The Hay-Pauncefote treaties speak for themselves. Each party to them plainly bound itself jointly with the other to neutralize the canal. The only thing found in the correspondence directly bearing on what countries were bound by them was in Lord Lansdowne's communication on the subject of the amendment put on the earlier Hay-Pauncefote treaty, where he said:

> If the amendment were added the obligations to respect the canal in all circumstances would, so far as Great Britain is concerned, remain in full force.

His view was that the amendment might be construed, in some event, to release the United States and leave Great Britain still bound to keep its guaranty of neutralization. The later treaty was negotiated, excluding the amendment, and leaving both nations bound to guarantee neutralization; and to avoid doubt arising as to the rights of the United States, in peace or war, pertinent language was used, as I have pointed out, defining just when the United States could use a military police force, and exclusively for what purpose, viz—> to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

Thus both treaties prohibited fortifying the canal. Mere neutralization as stipulated for in each treaty prohibits fortifications as everywhere understood and enforced.

The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty is now in full force. The Senate, when engaged in ratifying each treaty, understood that each prohibited fortifying the canal, and it favored neutralization and nonfortification, as its proceedings in executive session conclusively show.

The principal amendment adopted by the Senate to the earlier Hay-Pauncefote treaty reads thus:

> It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

This was to add to paragraph 5, Article III of that treaty, and it left section 7 unaffected, which expressly prohibited fortification. The amendment did not grant any right to the United States to fortify the canal or to do anything with its own forces save when it became necessary to defend "the United States and the maintenance of public order."

It was adopted December 15, 1900, with the full understanding that it would not give such right. This is shown by the proceedings in the Senate.

Senator Elkins, December 20, 1900, moved to add to this amendment the following:

> But nothing contained in this treaty shall be construed to prevent the United States from acquiring at any time sufficient territory, and sovereignty over the same, upon which to build, manage, operate, defend, protect, and control said canal, or for any other purpose, as the United States may deem best in its own interests.

This amendment was intended to give the United States the right to acquire territory and "to build—defend, protect—said canal" as the United States might deem best in its own interest. It was voted down—yeas 25, nays 45.

On the same day Senator Teller moved to strike out sections 3 and 4, a clause in section 5, Article II of the treaty, and the clause in section 7, Article II, prohibiting fortifications, which was likewise voted down.

Then Senator Butler moved to strike out the nonfortification clause of paragraph 7, which was voted down—yeas 26, nays 44.

Later, same day, Senator Mason moved to insert in Article II, after section 7, the following:

> Provided, Nothing herein contained shall prevent the United States from protecting said canal in any way it may deem necessary, if the United States shall construct said canal at its own expense.

This was likewise voted down—yeas 25, nays 44.

Later still, same day, Senator Teller moved to strike out of Article II the words "in time of war as in time of peace," and the words "and of war," which was also voted down.

Then immediately Senator TILLMAN moved to strike out the amendment agreed to and to insert in lieu thereof this:

> It is agreed, however, that none of the foregoing conditions and stipulations of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of order.

This amendment was rejected—yeas 27, nays 43. Other motions to the same effect were voted down, and the treaty was, December 20, 1900, ratified—yeas 55, nays 18.

Nothing could be more conclusive of the Senate's understanding and desire that this treaty forbid fortifications, even though the canal should be built at the expense of the United States, and that it should forever, in time of peace or war, be open and free to the ships of the world.

The Senate never changed this understanding and desire.

This treaty not being satisfactory to Great Britain, because of the amendment, a new one—dated November 18, 1901—was negotiated to get rid of its objection.

As already shown, a clause was so placed in the later one as to define just what, and only what, the United States might do, namely—> be at liberty to maintain such military force along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

This clause recognized the universally accepted rule that neutralization itself prohibited fortifications or other war preparations, and it declared what, in a particular case, the United States might be at liberty to do to protect the canal "against lawlessness and disorder."

It was a very proper provision, and it left no room for a misunderstanding, and it excluded all other right; and it was so understood by the President, as stated in transmitting the treaty to the Senate, and by it when it ratified the treaty, as its proceedings amply show.

When this later treaty came up for ratification, Senator CULBERSON—December 16, 1901—moved to insert in it the principal amendment the Senate had added to the former treaty, but his motion was voted down—yeas 15, nays 65.

The clause which gave the United States the liberty to "maintain such military police along the canal" as it might find necessary to "protect it against lawlessness and disorder" was, by the Senate, regarded as all the separate right desired or that should be asked in view of the neutralization.

As a further test, Senator McLaurin—December 16, 1901—moved to strike out of Article III of the treaty the words:

> Substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal.

His motion was rejected and the treaty was then ratified without amendment—72 yeas, 6 nays—and it is still in full force.

The provisions of this Hay-Pauncefote treaty are so plain and explicit as not to admit of doubt as to its meaning.

It provides for neutralization. How, then, can the canal be taken possession of and fortified? It provides that the "canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations;" how, then, can it be closed to such vessels by military force? It provides that the "canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it;" how, then, can fortifications, which, as the report of the Fortification Board shows, are to blockade the canal, and an army be maintained on the line of the canal? It provides that while in "the canal, vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores" except when strictly necessary, nor "embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and shall not remain in the canal more than 24 hours," nor "depart within 24 hours from the departure of the vessels of war of the other belligerent;" how are vessels to do this if no vessel of a belligerent is to be admitted at all?

The neutralization provided for in the treaty is to "apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end;" how can this be if the United States is at liberty to blockade or fortify the canal and thus prevent all neutralization?

It provides that "the plant, establishment, buildings, etc., of the canal shall be deemed a part thereof—and in time of war as in time of peace shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents;" how is this right to be enjoyed if the United States assumes the right to close the canal whenever, in peace or war, it pleases to do so?

Nothing in this treaty gives the United States greater authority in time of war than in time of peace, whether it is a party to a war or not. Article IV provides that no change of territorial sovereignty will give any right to build a canal, save under the neutralization and obligations of the treaty. When this (1901) treaty was made the United States had no sovereignty of any kind over any territory on the Isthmus. It first acquired a limited authority over the Canal Zone from Panama under a treaty dated November 18, 1903. Clearly the United States by acquiring the Zone did not acquire any right to violate its treaty obligations.

The statement that the "treaty with Panama reaffirms the treaty with England of 1900 and expressly gives the power of fortifications" is worse than inaccurate.

The Panama treaty does not refer to the 1900 Hay-Pauncefote treaty at all, and both treaties provide for neutralization and prohibit fortifications, as I have pointed out.

And the Panama treaty—November 18, 1903—neutralizes the canal by adopting the existing Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Article XVIII reads:

> The canal, when constructed, and the entrance thereto, shall be neutral in perpetuity and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of Article III of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

And Article XXV of the same treaty provides for "the efficient protection of the canal and the preservation of its neutrality."

It is true that Article XXIII of this treaty says the United States may "employ armed forces for the safety and protection of the canal or of the ships which make use of it" when, and only when "it should become necessary," and "grants the right to use its police and its land and naval forces to establish fortifications for these purposes," but for no others.

There is not one word in the treaty which by any reasonable construction authorizes the United States, or any country, to fortify or blockade the canal, or any part of it. Article XXIII gives no right that would not exist without it, and whatever authority it does give is consistent with the neutralization, nonfortification, nonblockade, and so forth, provided for in existing treaties and as expressly required by Articles XVIII and XXV of the Panama treaty.

It must always be remembered that guaranteed neutralization may require force to maintain it, and that there is no restriction on the guarantors as to the force they may use for that purpose.

Neutralization may be fought for as well as any other thing. Why not fight to maintain peace rather than for conquest, or for the love of war?

The theory that the treaty with England only binds the United States to "guarantee the neutrality of the canal" needs no further comment. Our country can not neutralize its own territory, and the treaty obligates both countries to guarantee neutralization for the canal.

SEE ITS PREAMBLE AND ARTICLE IV.

Have Presidents, statesmen, and Senators been engaged for almost a century making treaties to secure neutralization only to find they could only bind one party, and that one had the right, at will, to violate it, or could do as it pleased about it? There are also other treaties neutralizing the Panama Canal.

If the United States only is bound to neutralize the canal, has the time arrived for it to violate its obligation and put the Panama Canal on a war footing against all the world?

It will not be seriously claimed that the United States has to preserve the canal as a transit for belligerents in time of war when the United States is not engaged. This absurd claim assumes that the treaties in some way provide for a time of war when the United States is not involved. Not a word is found in any treaty giving the United States any rights when at war that it does not possess in time of peace or when other nations are at war. No nation not at war or seeking war with the United States would attack the canal, although at war with another nation, hence the provision of the 1901 treaty, paragraph 6, Article III, already referred to, granting "in time of war as in time of peace complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents" can only refer to belligerents engaged in war with the United States. Such was the interpretation given the treaty by its draftsmen, by the President of the United States, and by the Senate.

COST OF FORTIFICATIONS AND THEIR MAINTENANCE.

The statement minimizing the cost of fortifying the Panama Canal is made on imperfect information.

The $12,475,328 estimate for the purpose of commencing fortifications is, as the fortification board states, only sufficient to start the work. Its earlier estimate was $19,545,843, and this did not, as the board states, include anything for "the cost of construction for naval purposes" nor for necessary "naval stations," "naval establishments," including harbors at both ends, dry docks and battleships for each end of the canal in peace or war, nor for an adequate army of occupation, permanent camps and barracks, sites therefor, and other expensive matters deemed necessary by the fortification board. A substantial increase of our Army and Navy, now regarded as too small, will necessarily be required. So as to our Navy.

Instead of the cost of maintaining the Army and Navy and their establishments on and at the ends of the canal not exceeding $500,000, it will run into millions. The sanitation alone necessary to be maintained will far exceed that sum. Its cost last year on the zone was above $1,800,000, and it may exceed this sum if the canal is to be kept constantly on a war footing by an Army of occupation and a Navy.

Fortifications and naval stations not provided at all times with an adequate Army, guns, and battleships would be the worst of folly should a war suddenly break out. They are absolutely useless except in case of war, hence if necessary at all they must always be ample for war. There would also have to be large depots for Army and Navy supplies of all kinds, quartermaster, commissary, ordnance, coal, and the like, as in time of war transportation would become impossible save under the convoy of a strong fleet of battleships.

There are no harbors at either terminus of the canal, and none can be made at any reasonable cost for battleships to ride in. Not even Panama City, on the Pacific side, or Colon or Cristobal, on the Atlantic side, has a harbor suitable for such ships or for a naval station. The so-called bays have now to be dredged for a considerable distance into the oceans for extensions of the canal channel to get the required 50 feet depth. On the Pacific end the dredging extends beyond the islands belonging to the zone and far out from the mainland. At Balboa, formerly called La Boca, there is now about completed a breakwater extending from the shore of the mainland to the island of Naos to protect the canal channel. On the Atlantic side, if warships could even be anchored within Limon Bay, which they can not, the frequency and hurricane character of storms would drive them out or destroy them. What it would cost to make suitable harbors to meet the recommendations of the fortification board will be hard to compute. The expenditure of $100,000,000 would not suffice for the purpose.

Just now we understand Congress is expected to authorize the United States to establish coaling and other supply stations solely for vessels arriving at the canal; also dry docks for repairing ships, and for whatever else may be required to aid and promote navigation and commerce. This will be right and proper under the treaties, but they could not be used in time of war to which the United States was a party unless neutralization obtains, or for our battleships at any time. Transports carrying supplies for such purposes, with colliers for coal, and so forth, would have, in time of such war, or even apprehended war, to be convoyed by a fleet of battleships to insure their safety. If the canal is fortified, on the same principle fleets of battleships should be provided to constantly convoy supply ships to and fro to prevent them from capture on a sudden outbreak of war. Neutralization will avoid all expense of fortifications and of such fleets and insure freedom from danger.

INTERNATIONAL TREATIES ARE NOT VIOLATED.

Treaties or engagements signed by many nations never have been violated and they never will be. Why did the United States enter into the treaties and subscribe to the rules and regulations adopted by the great Hague Peace Conference and then ratify and proclaim them to all the world of binding force if they were never intended to be observed?

Thus far I have barely referred to the treaty now in force between the United States and New Granada (now Colombia) dated December 12, 1846, by which the United States in express terms "guarantees positively and efficaciously the perfect neutrality—the free transit from one to the other sea—not to be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time." This treaty was brought about by negotiations first initiated by President John Quincy Adams and earnestly advocated by Daniel Webster and Henry Clay and especially urged by President Andrew Jackson; also indorsed by a Senate resolution of March 3, 1835, and a like House resolution of 1839.

FRANCHISE UNDER WHICH CANAL IS BUILT.

And I should refer again to the Colombia franchise, under which the United States is now building the canal and for which we paid the New Panama Canal Co. (the French company) $40,000,000 for its rights under it, and we also paid $10,000,000 more to the Republic of Panama for confirming it, and further agreed to pay it $250,000 yearly forever, to commence November 18, 1912, and to transport through the canal and over its auxiliary railroad its vessels, troops, and munitions of war free at all times, and we also guaranteed its independence forever.

A provision of this franchise, dated May 17, 1878, is a guaranty of neutrality "for all time" of the canal to be built under it, in these words:

ART. V. The Government of the Republic declares neutral for all time the ports at both ends of the canal and the waters of the same from one ocean to the other; and, in consequence, in case of war between nations, the transit of the canal shall not be interrupted, and the merchant vessels and individuals of all the nations of the world can enter said ports and pass through the canal without being molested.

Articles VIII and XII of the Panama treaty authorized the New Panama Co. (the French company) to sell and transfer its rights under said franchise to the United States, and it bound itself in its purchase from that company to maintain the canal as provided in the franchise.

RULES OF WAR NEUTRALIZE CANAL.

It should also be again observed that the 1907 Hague Peace Conference adopted rules of war and regulations to govern the rights and duties of neutralized places, which severally prohibit bombardment of undefended ports, neutral territory and neutral waters, or the commission of other acts which would be a violation of neutralization or which would result in the destruction or seizure of any property of the enemy in time of war, save when imperatively necessary.

These rules and regulations were signed severally by 42 of the powers of the world, the United States heading the list, Russia, Japan, England, France, Germany, Austria, Spain, Argentina, Colombia, and Brazil, and all other great powers being among the number. The United States later, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, ratified all these rules and regulations, and President Taft, February 28, 1910, proclaimed them of binding force—to be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

It will be seen that, without treaty guaranties of neutralization, if the canal is undefended, all the powers of the world are solemnly bound not to fire upon or destroy it, even in time of war in which the United States is a party. The moral force as well as the binding character of these rules and regulations insure their observance.

POLICY OF NEUTRALIZATION.

The policy of the United States, at least since Monroe's administration, should also be respected. Presidents, Secretaries of State, statesmen and patriots, Senators and Representatives have, in unbroken line, favored complete neutralization of any isthmian canal. This is made manifest by messages, Executive papers, correspondence, Senate and House resolutions, treaties, and otherwise, which I have referred to and quoted liberally from in my recent speech of January 19, 1911.

The Presidents and great statesmen from Monroe to President Taft did not regard international neutralization treaties as infringing the Monroe doctrine.

No instance during that time will be found where the right to neutralize the canal when built was opposed, or the right of the United States to fortify it was advocated, unless, possibly, by a very small minority of Senators during the proceedings to ratify the Hay-Pauncefote treaties, and they hardly went so far as to favor such right.

STRATEGIC IMPORTANCE OF NEUTRALIZATION.

The strongest reason, however, even stronger, if possible, than the treaty obligations, is the strategic importance to the United States of neutralizing the Panama Canal in case it is engaged in war. In that event it would not have to defend the canal; its safety would be guaranteed beyond peradventure; its revenues and that of its auxiliary railroad would not be interrupted; our Army and Navy would be free to pass and repass through it and to operate when and where needed; the great expense for fortifications, harbors, naval stations, dry docks for our Navy, and the like, and for additions to the Army and Navy of the United States, including a substantial increase of officers and men, also battleships, and for other necessary offensive and defensive war preparations and for the cost of sanitation; for transports to continuously carry supplies, and for other expenses of maintenance and the keeping of the canal and its auxiliary railroad on a continuous war footing, would also be saved.

To close the canal, in time of war, to other nations or to the enemy would secure no advantage, nor would any strategic advantage be lost to the United States by keeping it open. If the enemy had a fleet in Atlantic waters, we would meet him there, and if in Pacific waters we would meet him there, and if he had a divided fleet, one in each ocean, we would concentrate our warships and beat him in detail.

If we fortify the canal, we must maintain an army of occupation of great strength at its ends and on its line, likewise fleets of ships to support the Army, and if the canal should not be held it would be lost to the United States. In time of war the United States will need its military and naval forces elsewhere.

But by no possibility would the canal be lost to the United States if neutralized, not even by defeat in war. A treaty of neutralization is never broken, and its guarantors would enforce it; and should it, by any possibility, be violated they would require ample indemnity.

PEACE.

Peace, general peace, would be promoted by neutralization, the most important of all considerations. The Panama Canal was designed to promote commerce, not war. In the century of discussion over the practicability and necessity of connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by a canal across the Isthmus of Panama not a suggestion has been made, until very recently, by anybody, either by a President or statesman or by either branch of Congress or any Member thereof, that such canal should be built as a necessary war measure. As commerce does not flourish in war times, neutralization has always been insisted on to preserve commerce in time of war as in time of peace. It has been a promise to the civilized world ever since a canal across the Isthmus of Panama was thought practicable that it should, in perpetuity, be neutralized—kept open and free to the ships and flags of all nations "in time of war as in time of peace."

The Republic of the United States, with all its boasted Christian civilization, should be the last to break this sacred promise and to violate the policy of neutralization so long proclaimed by our predecessors.

The duty of the United States to neutralize the canal is both of obligation and interest.

It should be neutralized for strategic as well as economic reasons and to promote peace on earth.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the learned opinion expressed by the Chair a few moments since. I do not hesitate to say that I differ with the Chair in the construction that is given to the different treaties referred to. It was my pleasure and my honor, Mr. Chairman, as the Chair well knows, to be associated with the Chair in the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee at the time that the Hepburn bills were being introduced. I say that I challenge anyone here to-night to say that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 related to anything else except that Great Britain and the United States should neither one own any land that the Isthmian Canal was to pass over, or own any stock in any company or any private corporation that was organized to construct that Isthmian Canal, and it went one step further than that. It proposed to confer with the different nations of the world and invite them to join with them in guaranteeing that that canal should never be fortified.

I know just as well as any gentleman on this floor knows that this canal was not built under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but that treaty expresses the idea and an opinion that never can be removed or destroyed. It expresses the opinion that Great Britain had, that the canal should be constructed under those circumstances where neither the British Government nor the United States of America had any land interest or any stock in it, and should never be fortified. It expressed the opinion, in which our Government agreed, that all the nations of the world should be invited to join in that guaranty. I ask these intelligent gentlemen here to-night what was the next step that has power and influence in controlling the settlement of this question here to-night?

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty came along in the year 1900. What was the purpose of it? What object did it have in view? What did it propose to accomplish? It was nothing but to regain and secure the power that they had lost in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That is, to fortify the canal. Nobody questions but what that was the purpose of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The chairman of the committee in reading his opinion, which meant nothing else except that the canal could be fortified by authority of law—I ask him and I ask any well-informed gentleman on this floor to-night what sentence, what paragraph of law has been referred to in these proceedings that tends to convince you or anyone else that there is authority of law to put fortifications there.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not say so. It is absolutely silent on that subject. What treaty is there, then, that says so? I ask what treaty and where is the authority that it came from? None but the treaty that Mr. Roosevelt, as President of the United States, entered into with the little Panama Republic that we created in the wrong way. That is the treaty and the only treaty that justifies or allows anyone to say that there is any authority of law.

Mr. Chairman, I can not vote this amount of money or any amount of money for the fortification of the canal, when I remember, Mr. Chairman, that in all the wars that our country has engaged in in the past that we have always attacked the foreign power and that no foreign power has ever attacked us. If we follow the precedents of our past, what need will we have for fortifications? To decline to fortify, in my opinion, opens broad the way of peace and preserves friendly relations with all other powers. To fortify means that we are looking for war; and, looking for it, we will sooner or later find it. I am an advocate of the preparations for peace and not for war. We ought not, Mr. Chairman, at this time to forget the manner in which this Government acquired the canal strip in Panama. Mr. Chairman, a darkened spot lives in the career of Frederick II of Prussia, when in profound peace he swooped down with his army on Silesia, an undisputed part of the domain of the Empress of Austria, and possessed it for his own purposes. Our Government threw its marines into Panama on the pretext of suppressing a revolt engaged in by hardly a score of men, and prevented the soldiers of Colombia, with which we had an honorable treaty, from suppressing the pantomime revolt. We then proceeded to recognize Panama as a Republic, and formed with that Republic a treaty that gave us the only authority to fortify the canal. Our Government will yet be held to account for that wrong and injustice to the Republic of Colombia. I can not vote to build fortifications at Panama. It means that a standing army will be constantly on guard at Panama to man these fortifications. No man can surmise the expense that this Government will be subjected to for this policy of fortifications. It all means war instead of peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has referred to certain mistakes that he assumed the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] had made. I wish to refer to certain mistakes that the gentleman from Ohio has made. I refer first to the position of Admiral George Dewey. The gentleman from Ohio stated that Admiral Dewey had opposed the fortification of the Panama Canal. I have a letter from Admiral Dewey, dated February 1, which reads as follows:

> The remarks quoted as coming from me in Gen. KEIFER'S speech of January 19 last, that I was opposed to fortifying the Isthmian Canal, were made several years ago before we had any right under the then existing treaties to fortify it and, indeed, when there was doubt whether there ever would be a canal there.
> I am now in favor and am on record, as president of the general board and the joint board, as strongly indorsing and urging the fortification of the canal.
> GEORGE DEWEY.

[Applause.]

I wish to refer, in the second place, to another mistake of the gentleman in quoting the late President of the United States. I am reliably informed that not only is the late President himself strongly in favor of the fortification of the canal, but that he has stated that the British ambassador, in answer to a direct question of his at the time of the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, had declared that Great Britain acknowledged and willingly accepted the right of the United States to fortify the canal under the terms of the treaty.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in some ways the bulk of this discussion has been wide of the field. It has seemed to hinge around technicalities or interpretations of treaties. I wish to ask, Has any nation yet registered any protest against the United States fortifying the canal? Not one. Since the adoption of the treaty with Panama granting us the right to fortify that canal, has any nation yet questioned that right? Again, has there been any nation or group of nations that has ever requested us to neutralize that canal? Not one. For years America's rights have been tacitly acknowledged by all the world. It is unnecessary and gratuitous to inject foreign nations into this American question. When a great question like this arises, the way to move for a nation as for a man is to get the simple, fundamental facts, to stand upon the elemental truth, the laws of nature, and find the straight and narrow path of duty, and, having found the path of duty, to follow it without hesitation. [Applause.] Where does duty lead us in this crisis? As much with the nation as with a man, the first law in nature, and therefore its first duty, is self-preservation. The law of self-preservation dictates that this Nation shall fortify the canal and control it when questions of national defense arise. I will illustrate. The question of passing through the canal would be vital to the success or the failure of war in which this Nation's destiny will be involved. Can there be any question among patriotic Americans whether they should leave the control of the canal and the success or the failure of the war in the hands of any other power or group of powers? To-day there are two existing conventions of nations to guarantee international rights and the vital interests of individual nations. One is in the case of Manchuria. The United States took the initiative and secured the cooperation of all the great powers of the world to guarantee the territorial integrity of China and the principle of the open door.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HOBSON. I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOBSON. I will say, gentlemen, I do not intend to abuse your patience; I know you are ready to vote, and I know you are going to vote like Americans and like patriots. Now, in the neutralization of Manchuria, America secured a solemn pledge from the very same nations that we would get a pledge from to-day if we neutralized the Panama Canal, but in the short time that has elapsed China has been the field of battle of two nations that made the neutralization guaranty of the integrity of China and the open-door policy, one of those nations declaring that the object of its going to war was to guarantee the integrity of Korea and the open-door policy of Manchuria. That nation itself has absorbed Korea and in large measure dominates Manchuria.

The other case of international neutralization is that of the treaty of Berlin, in which the integrity of the Balkan Provinces is guaranteed by the same nations and much the same treaty or kind of treaty by which the Panama Canal would be guaranteed. This is one of the most solemn treaties ever signed by civilized nations, all the great nations agreeing to jointly guarantee the integrity of the Balkan Provinces.

Only two years ago, with that treaty still in full effect, Austria, backed by Germany, two signatories of the Berlin treaty, proceeded to seize Herzegovina and Bosnia, the Adriatic Provinces, to violate the pledge of the treaty, and not a voice was raised in protest. What nations are these that were reduced to point of impotency where they were compelled to confide their vital interests to international neutralization? The Empire of China and the Kingdom of Turkey. My patriotic fellow Americans, are we in the category of China and Turkey? Must we depend for the security of our vital interests upon the fickle pledges of other nations?

There is no power above treaties to compel their observation. Only when international treaties have international armies and navies to guarantee their fulfillment can a nation be justified in giving over its vital interests to the keeping of such an international agreement.

The absolute exclusive control of the canal in war is a fundamental duty we owe to our country. The canal is an integral part of our vital coast line on which we have thirty-seven billions of our property and thirty millions of our citizens living within gunshot of the water. The digging of that canal places the whole Gulf and Atlantic seaboard, with our thirty-seven billions of property and inhabitants in proportion, within striking distance of the developing powers of Asia. It places our Pacific coast and all of our interests in that great ocean within striking distance of the great nations of Europe. We have doomed ourselves to a one-fleet Navy. Without the canal that fleet can not operate or give protection in the opposite ocean. Without the absolute and exclusive control of the Panama Canal we are doomed to see constantly one of our great coast lines absolutely defenseless. Shall we voluntarily, gratuitously, be guilty of the folly of committing ourselves to one fleet, as we have done, and then leave that fleet to protect both coasts, with the canal at the mercy of an enemy, imposing upon our fleet the impossible task of operating by the route around Cape Horn? It is idle to pretend that other powers would protect the canal against an act that would be disavowed by the enemy's government after it had blocked the canal or after the enemy's fleet beyond the entrance destroyed our fleet as it emerged one vessel at a time.

We owe it to ourselves, our self-preservation, to our vital interests, to the first law of nature, to fortify and control that canal for our exclusive use in time of war. [Applause.] We further owe it as a duty to the nations in this hemisphere.

By digging this canal we have thrown the nations of Central and South America into new dangers of attack; nations on the Pacific coast to attack from Europe; nations on the Atlantic coast to attack from Asia. We must be able to neutralize this added danger.

For a hundred years America has given the outside world to understand that in this Western Hemisphere no foreign monarchy should further extend its political influence. When the French Panama Canal was being constructed, President Arthur notified Colombia that the interference of any European power in attempting to control that canal would be regarded as an unfriendly act by the United States. We proclaimed that even a foreign-built and foreign-owned canal would have to be controlled exclusively by America. Shall we now invite in European and Asiatic monarchies that have never acknowledged the Monroe doctrine and give over to them the control of an American-built canal? If we do, the Monroe doctrine, held sacred by our fathers, will perish by the act, the voice of monarchy and militarism will resound in our hemisphere, our own safety and tranquillity will end, our liberal institutions will perish in a colossal neglect of duty—our duty to ourselves, our duty to the Western Hemisphere, our duty to mankind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I said when this agreement was made that we would try and vote as near 9 o'clock as possible. The gentleman has already had 10 minutes. There are other gentlemen who desire to speak, and therefore I will have to object to any further extension.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I think it is due to me to make a response to the gentleman of only five minutes. This is the appropriate time to make the answer. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio wish to offer an amendment?

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to be heard in answer to the last speech. I move to strike out the last word. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the following amendment to both paragraphs as a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Insert, after line 18, on page 229, the following:

"Provided, That no part of this sum shall be available for expenditure until the President shall have determined, after proper endeavor by and through the treaty-making power vested in him by the Constitution, that he is unable to negotiate and conclude a treaty with a majority of the leading maritime nations of the world joining the United States in guaranteeing the proper preservation, protection, and safety of the Panama Canal and the entrances thereto, including protection from danger of blockade and the protection of vessels entering or desiring to enter therein, and the commerce thereon, in time of war as in time of peace, and other stipulations and provisions deemed necessary to protect the United States in its ownership, possession, control, sanitation, right to police, and to perpetually maintain said canal and the entrances thereto for the uses and purposes for which it is being constructed or may be adapted, and guaranteeing at all times to the signatory powers thereto the full and free use of said canal upon such terms and under such rules, regulations, and government as may be prescribed by the United States.

If the President be unable to negotiate such a treaty, he shall so signify by a proclamation made in the usual form to the people of the United States, and then, and not until then, shall this appropriation be available for expenditure for the purposes named therein."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky makes a point of order. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. The point of order, Mr. Chairman, is that it changes existing law, and while it is in the form of a limitation, yet it prevents the use of appropriation until the doing of certain acts by the Executive which are directed and which he is not obligated by existing law to perform.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suggest to the gentleman this, also, that those acts may not be accomplished within the year for which the appropriation is made.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is immaterial. The appropriation will continue available anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment provides that no part of this sum shall be available for expenditure until the President shall have done certain things. It seems to the Chair that it is a limitation, not a direction to the President to do anything.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair will continue to read, he will find that the President is directed.

The CHAIRMAN. The point that the gentleman from Kentucky refers to, I think, is this:

If the President shall be unable to negotiate such a treaty, he shall so signify by a proclamation, made in the usual form, to the people of the United States, and then, and not until then, shall this appropriation be available for the purposes named therein.

Mr. SHERLEY. But, Mr. Chairman, while it professes to be a limitation, the whole trend of the amendment is to direct the President, and that is clearly shown by the amendment then stating how the President shall inform the country as to whether or not he has succeeded in doing the things that he has been directed to do. It is very plain, as it seems to me.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the last paragraph is deemed by the Chair to make the amendment not in order, it is immaterial, and it can be stricken off. I ask unanimous consent to have the last paragraph stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] asks unanimous consent to strike out the last paragraph of his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the Chair rule upon it first.

Mr. MACON. Yes; let the gentleman from Minnesota get a ruling from the Chair first.

Mr. RICHARDSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise, Mr. Chairman, to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question. I desire to know if the United States shall be required to communicate with all the other world powers before this money can be used?

Mr. TAWNEY. I was unable, Mr. Chairman, to hear the question of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I could not hear the resolution over here distinctly, but I wanted to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if the purport of the gentleman's resolution was to the effect that before the money provided in this paragraph of the bill could be used the President of the United States should consult and negotiate with the other powers in reference to the guarantee of the neutrality of the canal?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the effect of it. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, a further reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota confirms me in my belief that it is subject to a point of order. But this is a matter going to the very vital aspect of the proposition now before the House. I, for one, am perfectly willing to leave the proposition embodied in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota to the wisdom of the House, and in order that the House may vote directly upon it, I withdraw my point of order on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky withdraws his point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, thus far this debate has been confined almost entirely to the question of our right to fortify the Panama Canal. The question of whether or not we should enter upon the policy of fortifying this great international waterway when completed, what that policy will mean to the American people in the future in the way of permanent and extensive financial burdens, and whether it will be effective as a means of protecting the neutrality of the canal has not been considered.

I will not take issue with gentlemen who contend for our right to fortify the canal. We may concede that right, and yet, in my judgment, to exercise it will not only impose unnecessary financial burdens upon the people, but will jeopardize both the neutrality and the safety of the canal.

Every Member of this House knows and realizes that our determination of this question here to-night means the adoption of a permanent policy. If we decide to fortify the canal, those fortifications must be not only constructed but also maintained for all time to come. From time to time they will have to be renewed. In addition to this, it will be necessary to maintain on the Canal Zone a standing army to protect the fortifications as long as they remain there. Therefore, independent of the question of our right to fortify the canal, we must look to the effect of that policy upon future generations, as well as its effect upon the fulfillment of our solemn treaty obligations to insure the neutrality of the canal and our duty to protect the canal itself.

I was a Member of this House when the construction of the Panama Canal was authorized. If the proposition to enter upon the policy of fortifying the canal at the admitted cost of that policy had then been contemplated, or if it had been claimed that it would be necessary to fortify it, the construction of the canal would not have been authorized. Members who served in that Congress will recall that much of the opposition to our embarking upon that great project was based upon the enormous cost contemplated. They will recall that at that time it was represented and believed that the cost of constructing the canal would not exceed $150,000,000. I doubt, Mr. Chairman, had it been known or believed at that time that the construction of the canal would cost the American people practically $400,000,000, exclusive of the expense of constructing and maintaining fortifications, whether the friends of the proposition would ever have succeeded in securing votes enough to adopt it. [Applause.]

When the matter was under consideration in Congress at that time the proposition that it would ever be necessary to fortify the canal, or that it was our purpose and intention in authorizing its construction, to utilize it as a military asset was not even suggested. The proposition then was not to construct the canal for our own benefit alone, nor, as I have frequently heard my distinguished colleague from Iowa on the Committee on Appropriations say, for the purpose of utilizing it as a military asset, but for the benefit of the commerce of the entire world. By treaty obligations we have bound ourselves to give to the nations of the world the right to use the canal on terms of equality with ourselves in times of peace as in times of war. We have, therefore, thus conferred upon the nations of the world a property right in the canal, for we have given them the right to use, and the right to use is a property right. Now, after spending almost a half billion dollars for the benefit of the world and its commerce in the construction of the canal, it is proposed to fasten upon the American people, in addition to the great expense incident to the maintenance of the canal, the enormous expense necessary to the construction of fortifications and thereafter a perpetual annual charge of many millions of dollars for the protection of these fortifications.

Mr. Chairman, what will this cost mean to our people? Since the conclusion of the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill this evening I have roughly estimated that cost, including the cost of maintaining and operating the canal itself. First, we have authorized the issue of $375,000,000 of bonds, bearing 3 per cent interest, to meet the expense of constructing the canal for the benefit of the world. The annual interest charge on these bonds will be $11,255,000. The estimated annual cost of maintaining the canal, including depreciation, is about $7,000,000. The cost of fortifying the canal, according to the judgment of one of the best-informed engineers in the Army; one, too, who knows more than any other about the canal and the cost of fortifying it under the plan of the fortification board, will aggregate not less than $60,000,000. The annual interest charge on that sum at 3 per cent would be $1,800,000, and depreciation, estimated at 10 per cent, would be $6,000,000. The pay, subsistence, and transportation of the Army, which, it is claimed, will have to be maintained permanently on the Canal Zone, will amount to $8,400,000 annually. Lieut. Gen. Wood, when before the Committee on Appropriations, said that it will be necessary to have on the Canal Zone not less than 7,000 men, including Coast Artillery, Cavalry, and Infantry. According to his testimony, our experience shows that in the United States a thousand troops can not be maintained for less than $1,200,000. The cost of maintaining 7,000 men on the Canal Zone will, therefore, be $8,400,000.

It may be said that if these 7,000 men were not stationed permanently on the Canal Zone, they would have to be paid and subsisted in the States and that, therefore, the only additional cost would be the difference between the cost in the States and the cost on the Canal Zone. Mr. Chairman, does anyone here to-night believe that if these 7,000 men are taken from the Army now stationed at different points in the States, the Army will not be able to secure an increase in the standing Army sufficient to meet the loss occasioned by the withdrawal of troops for the protection of the fortifications of the canal? At this session of Congress we have already increased the number of officers in the Army by 250. It is also proposed to place the National Guard of the several States on the pay roll of the Federal Government, thereby increasing our cost for preparation for war about $8,000,000 annually. The same influences which have secured this increase in the number of officers, and which will place the National Guard on the pay roll of the Federal Government, can very easily secure the increase in the standing Army necessary to take the place of those troops which are withdrawn for service in the Canal Zone. We may therefore very properly charge to the fortification of the canal the pay, subsistence, and transportation of the Army which it is proposed to maintain there permanently as a means of protecting the fortifications and the canal.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another item which will constitute a perpetual annual charge, the magnitude of which can be estimated only by the expenditure for the same purpose during the construction of the canal. The presence of the troops on the Canal Zone, as proposed, will necessitate continuing the system of sanitation which we have been obliged to maintain, and the cost of which will not be less than from one to one and a half million dollars a year. The annual cost of maintaining our system of sanitation during the construction of the Panama Canal has equaled almost $2,000,000. It may be said that we would have to provide for the sanitation of the Canal Zone in any event. In a sense that is true, because we will have a few people there employed in connection with the operation of the canal. But when the Committee on Appropriations visited the zone last November for the purpose of examining the estimates for canal expenditure, Col. Gorgas, who is in charge of the sanitary department, informed a member of the committee that the sanitation necessary on account of the operation of the canal will not cost the Government more than $15,000. The difference in cost is due to the number of men who would be distributed throughout the Canal Zone and who would have to be protected against those insects which infest that tropical country and which transmit malaria and fever germs.

The aggregate annual expense, therefore, of operating and maintaining the canal for the benefit of the world, and maintaining the troops on the zone for its protection and the protection of the fortifications, will amount in round numbers to $36,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, it is proposed to fasten on the American people this perpetual annual charge for the purpose, as the Commanding General of the Army, before the Committee on Appropriations, in effect said, of being prepared to prevent other nations from using the canal, or, in other words, prepared to violate our solemn treaty obligations, if in the judgment of the Government such violation is desirable.

The highest estimate thus far made of the receipts accruing to the Government in the operation of the canal is $4,000,000 annually. We have, therefore, a net annual loss to the American people in the event we fortify the canal, including the loss sustained in consequence of the operation and maintenance of the canal, of about $32,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, if it were desirable to invite the nations of the world to destroy the Panama Canal, no better method of extending that invitation could be adopted than to fortify it. We will thereby say to the world that we will insure and protect the neutrality of the canal so long as we deem it necessary or convenient to do so. But when we no longer deem the neutralization of the canal necessary to our interests we will be prepared to violate our solemn treaty obligations with other nations by terminating the neutrality of the canal. In proof of this statement, let me read from the testimony of Gen. Wood:

> The CHAIRMAN. Is it not a fact that in the last analysis the purpose of fortifying the canal is to insure to the United States its use as a military asset in case of war?
> Gen. WOOD. That is undoubtedly the most important of all the purposes of fortifying the canal.

Again:

> Mr. FITZGERALD. The purpose of the board (the fortification board) is to secure to the United States the exclusive control of the canal in time of hostilities?
> Gen. WOOD. That is the principal purpose of fortifying the canal.

Again Gen. Wood said:

> But, as I look at it, one thing is certain. We shall build the canal and maintain it for the use of all countries in time of peace and control it in time of war as our safety and interests demand.

This declaration of purpose, coming from Lieut. Gen. Wood, Chief of Staff, when read in the light of our solemn treaty obligations with Great Britain, contained in article 3 of that treaty, which says that "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules"—that is, the rules governing the neutralization prescribed in the treaty—discloses a national purpose in respect to our relations with the other nations of the world more in keeping with the diplomatic policies of nations during the Middle Ages than with the high standard of national honor which all nations now profess and endeavor to follow. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in fortifying the canal we make it the legitimate object of prey when we have a war with another nation, or when two nations having the right to use the canal are at war with one another. I say, therefore, that instead of protecting the canal by fortifying it, we are jeopardizing our property, for we make it the legitimate object of war. To my mind this proposition is incomprehensible. To my mind it is equivalent to saying to the nations of the world: "Although we have given to you a property right, or the right to use the canal in time of peace as well as in time of war, we are not willing to rely upon your honor or your fidelity in the exercise of that right, and, therefore, we must be prepared to prevent you from exercising your right to use the canal whenever we believe that such use would jeopardize either the canal or the interests of the United States."

In my judgment and, I believe, in the judgment of the great majority of the American people who have not been hypnotized by the policy of militarism, it would be far better for us to rely upon the material interest which every nation in the world has in maintaining the integrity of the canal and protecting it than to construct fortifications for that purpose. If we can not rely for the protection of the canal and its neutrality upon the honor and good faith of the nations for whose benefit the American people, at a cost of $400,000,000, have constructed it, then we can not protect the canal and its neutrality with fortifications.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I have offered the amendment which has just been read, which, if agreed to, will enable the President of the United States within the next year to ascertain whether or not the principal maritime powers are willing to unite with us in a convention or treaty whereby they will be bound not only not to injure or destroy the canal themselves, but to aid us in protecting it against any nation which might declare its purpose to do so. If that can be done it ought to be done. The attempt should at least be made before embarking upon a policy which will necessitate a perpetual annual charge upon our people, one that will grow more burdensome as time goes by, and one that may make it necessary in the future to construct additional fortifications and to maintain permanently on the Canal Zone an army three times the size of the army now proposed, for no man can predict, once we have embarked upon the policy of fortifying the canal, the extent to which these fortifications may be enlarged and extended in the future.

I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be agreed to. If it is, the President will then have an opportunity to ascertain whether the nations of the world are willing, in consideration of the enormous expense the American people have incurred in the construction of the canal for their benefit, to give bond that they will not under any circumstances interfere with the right of the United States to prescribe rules and regulations for the use of the canal, and that they will not, intentionally or otherwise, injure or attempt to destroy it. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, let no man mistake the purpose of this limitation. If adopted, it practically nullifies the appropriation carried in this bill; and that is its purpose, not even its veiled purpose. [Applause.] By the terms of this limitation it would be impossible for the President of the United States under a series of years to comply therewith, and in the meanwhile the Panama Canal will have been finished and opened to the traffic of the world. The proposition, therefore, involved in the amendment is the basic proposition of whether we will fortify or not. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] presents a wonderful array of figures. I might recite figures half or a quarter as low and they would have just as much basis in fact as his, because they would represent my guess as against his guess without sufficient information in either instance to make that guess worth while. Not only is that true, but against the statement that 7,000 men will be needed to police the canal, I say to you that the highest authority that I know of in regard to the Panama Canal, the man who has done most to make it a reality and not a dream, does not share any such extreme ideas as to numbers or cost of the policing of the canal. The gentleman from Minnesota said fortifying it is an invitation to attack. I say to you that neutrality not only of a belligerent against us, but in the case of two other powers will be observed only when there is force to make the observance necessary. [Applause.] Do you suppose without any means of making good the neutrality of the canal, that if a strong nation had pressed a weak nation's fleet and that fleet takes shelter in the harbor at either end of the canal, the strong fleet realizing the opportunity by a decisive blow to settle the fate of the war, is going to stop to weigh the question of violation of neutrality? It will destroy its enemy and argue the question of the violation of neutrality afterwards.

Let the gentlemen who talk about neutrality being observed point to the instances where there has been any real punishment of a nation that has seen fit to violate neutrality. Has Japan been punished by any of the great nations for her violation of the treaty obligations in regard to Manchuria? Has Austria-Hungary been punished for the violation of the treaty agreements in regard to the Balkan States? Do you suppose that Belgium's neutrality would have been preserved during the Franco-Prussian War if it had not been for the show of force made by Belgium herself? Is Switzerland maintaining an army for nothing? Her neutrality has been guaranteed. It may be that in the far distant future the time will come when international agreements may be observed without any other force than the moral one that should sustain them, but there is nothing in the past history of the world that warrants the assumption that that time is now. Talk about cost! What folly it is, after having expended four hundred odd millions of dollars, to hesitate to spend a few more to protect what is practically a new coast line of America! [Applause.] Let nobody be deceived by the comparison of the Panama with the Suez Canal. If England did not depend for her position upon having a navy equal to that of any other two nations, she would not be so secure or content in regard to the neutralization of the Suez. Bear in mind, also, that the Suez Canal in its geographical relation is not of prime importance to England.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Bear in mind also that she is protecting the entrances there, but remember that Panama is right at our door. What means neutrality as gentlemen construe it? It means one of two things, as I said earlier in the debate. Either that in case of war between America and another country the canal shall be closed to both countries or open to both. Have we spent this money in vain? Have we made possible the passage of our fleet from one ocean to the other and then when the need for that passage comes we will agree that it shall not take place except with the long, impossible trip around the Horn? Or take the other proposition that the canal shall be kept open to both belligerents. Shall we throw away all of our advantage; shall we give to the attacking enemy the right to come through that canal; and if it had the right to come through it, do you believe it would hesitate to seize it? What would matter the violation of neutrality compared with the possession of one of the greatest assets of the Nation?

Mr. TAWNEY. A fleet would have to go there before it could enter there and 3½ miles off the shore belongs to the world.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does that mean, that it has to go there? It means that practically you have got to have a fleet in both oceans. But suppose you have a fleet in the Pacific Ocean and the war is with an enemy in the Pacific and it defeats your fleet. If we had the canal fortified what was left of the fleet could go into that canal, could join the Atlantic Fleet or the Atlantic Fleet could come through as a reenforcement. But what would you have as a result of the neutrality? The destruction of your fleet would mean instant seizure of the canal, and bear in mind this, in regard to paying the penalty for violation of neutralization, what will it weigh according to the advantge that would come to the enemy by the seizure of such property as the Panama Canal? The seizure and successful holding of that canal would be sufficient to force this country into terms of peace, and, bigger than any danger that it might suffer hereafter in the way of punishment, would be the advantage it gained by its possession. Gentlemen, it is resting upon an idle dream to hope that when the stress of war comes that nations will be so restrained as not to take advantage of the tremendous temptation that would be held out to them by the nonfortification of this canal. Better abandon the fortification of your seacoast and ask of the world that it enter into agreement to make neutral in time of war your coasts, because practically you have created now a most important coast line of America. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HOBSON and Mr. WANGER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] is recognized.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute a colon in lieu of the period at the end of the last paragraph and insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of the sums appropriated in this and the preceding paragraph shall be expended until the President, after reasonable effort, shall fail to secure from each of the other nations than Great Britain and Panama the assurance that they will observe the rules specified and cited in the canal treaty made between the United States and Great Britain in 1901."

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman yield to me while I ask that five minutes' time be given to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER], and five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], and five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH],

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for five minutes on this question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] is recognized.

Mr. WANGER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, it seems to me, is objectionable, in that it calls for a treaty with the other nations, who assume with the United States the functions of preserving order on the Canal Zone. In other words, it invites a large number of those entangling alliances and bargains against which we were warned so solemnly by the Father of Our Country.

Now, the way to maintain the neutrality of the canal and the way to preserve American supremacy therein is to make it for the interest of all the nations of the world that the American flag shall be dominant there. The reason why treaties have been violated in the past has been the fact that there was not a strong interest on the part of the great signatory powers to maintain them. But when the United States builds this great work and gives to all other nations the right of using the canal upon equal terms, every other nation than our particular enemy will be interested in our supremacy and in our peaceful possession of that canal and in the continuance of its opportunity without unreasonable cost to those other nations.

Why should any nation interfere with what was done in the Balkans, unless it was the interest of that nation in preserving some ancient treaty? Why has Russia never been able to get her ships of war freely out of the Black Sea? It is because other nations would rise up and declare that the old treaties must stand. They do it because their own interests prompt them to do it. And so, in the event of war between the United States and some other nation, all the other nations than the belligerents would want the Panama Canal kept open and free from bombardment and injury, and therefore they would do that for us which would cost us thousands of millions to do, not a hundred million merely, but more millions than have been and will be required for the complete construction of this great ocean way by the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Iowa for or against the amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am against the amendment and defending the text of the bill. Mr. Chairman, during the years of our service together it is seldom that I have differed from the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. But I feel constrained to-night to suggest what seemed to me to be defects in his figures. He tells us that the annual cost of the bond issue for building of the canal will be $11,256,000, evidently having estimated the entire interest at 3 per cent, when eighty-four millions have been sold at 2 per cent. He tells us that the annual maintenance for the canal will be $7,000,000, when the report was that it would be two and one-half million dollars. I understand he has included 10 per cent depreciation. The annual interest on the fortification bonds he puts at $1,800,000, whereas it will be $360,000 upon all the money spent for fortifications proper. Whether we in the future shall embark in the policy of a great naval station and dry-docks there and running up the expense to $60,000,000 I do not know, and that is not before the House now. To build seacoast fortifications, to build batteries for the canal, to build quarters for the soldiers, will only cost about $12,000,000, and the mistake in charging interest upon sixty millions in place of twelve millions has caused this error.

I simply mention these facts to show that I think the chairman exaggerates the expense of the maintenance of this defense. But I do not care whether he is right or wrong in his estimate, for I am for the fortifications anyway. [Applause.] I do not believe we built this canal purely as a commercial enterprise. It is a great commercial enterprise, it is true, but when the Oregon sailed around the Horn it fixed the building of this canal that the American Navy might more readily cross from sea to sea. [Applause.] That is what we are building this canal for, and if we are not to preserve it for that then we had better blow up the canal and quit work to-night on that great project. Better far stop the building of the canal and strike out all these appropriations for building it than to build it to be seized and utilized by our enemies in time of war. I care nothing, so far as I am concerned, whether the chairman's figures are correct or not. This is a proposition to repudiate the solemn action of this Government in saying, when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was up, that we would have no one else aid us in defending the canal, that we would defend it by our own strength and our own power. This proposition of the chairman is to recede from that courageous stand and depend upon other people to defend the canal. It is an old saying to "Trust in God, but keep your powder dry." I am willing to trust in the fidelity of the nations of the earth, but I am going to put guns down there to see that they keep the faith with us. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, a much broader question than one merely of dollars and cents is involved in the action to be taken to-night. Upon the determination of the House will depend the contribution to be made by the American people to the progress and advance of Christian civilization. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] bases his support of the proposition to fortify the canal upon the action of the American Government in negotiating the latest Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty provided that an Isthmian Canal should be constructed by Great Britain and the United States, and that neither party should in any way fortify or colonize the surrounding country. When the United States undertook to cancel that treaty and to provide that it should have the exclusive right to construct the canal, it determined that that right should not be impaired in any way by the concurrent right of some other power to participate in any manner whatever in its defense or neutralization. Such a position was essential as a matter of national pride and dignity, and our Government properly declined to enter into a treaty which would give it the right to construct the canal and at the same time give to some other nation the right to participate in its defense or neutralization.

But, Mr. Chairman, we have passed that point. The American people have established their right to construct the canal and to act regarding it as they please. The opportunity is now, and for the first time, presented to the Congress to determine whether it will take a step which will tend to perpetuate the present tremendous armaments of the world, or whether it will initiate a movement which will tend to reduce the great armaments of the world and promote some other method than war for the settlement of disputes between nations.

Our action to-night will mark an epoch in our history. With our unchallenged supremacy among the nations, with our unrivaled resources, and with our marvelous opportunity to promote peace on earth, and good will among men, the time is at hand when it must be determined whether our influence shall be cast into the balance in favor of incalculable war preparations and expenditures or exerted to lift from the already overburdened peoples of the earth the weight of militarism and the blight upon industrial effort and progress resulting from vainglorious and peace-menacing policies. To-night a message may be sounded throughout the civilized world that this liberty-loving and peace-abiding people, at enmity with none other, will by its example promote the notion of friendly concord with other nations, or the message will be one of universal distrust and anticipated discord.

If this appropriation be made in the way proposed, we are forever committed to the policy of largely augmenting the naval and military forces of the United States, not such from necessity to protect ourselves, but because of our lack of faith in all of the peoples of the earth. Could I bring myself to believe, as some gentlemen here seem to believe, that the nations of the earth had descended to such depths of depravity as have been depicted, I should be unwilling to trust them in the slightest in dealings upon any question, however insignificant; but to assert in advance that the great nations of the earth would willingly enter into solemn obligations to keep the canal neutral, to protect it for the benefit of all the people of the world, with the express intention of violating such an agreement, is a slander upon the nations of the world that I am unwilling to utter or to join with others who do.

Mr. Chairman, no one can estimate the cost in money to the United States from the policy proposed. Uncertain and unreliable are the estimates of our military experts as to the ultimate cost involved. On the 10th of August, 1910, the estimates submitted by the board for the fortification of the canal were $19,900,000. On the 4th of January, 1911, because of some opposition to the whispered reports as to the ultimate expenditure involved, a revised estimate was submitted which contends that the fortifications will cost not to exceed $12,000,000. When military experts can not make their estimates any more accurately, or can not remain fixed within 33 per cent of their estimates more than six months, it requires careful consideration by this Congress before the initiation of any project based upon such estimates.

The people of the United States have built this canal for the benefit of mankind; they have opened their inexhaustible treasury to the enterprise; they have spared neither men nor treasure in the work. Four hundred millions will be ungrudgingly expended upon this enterprise, the accomplishment of which has been the dream of civilized men for more than four centuries. This marvelous monument to the ingenuity, capacity, enterprise, and resourcefulness of our people is to be dedicated to mankind, to promote commerce and the peaceful pursuits of civilization. To initiate now an expenditure which may require fifty millions more of money to protect the canal from the assaults of those for whose benefit it will be completed will be the greatest crime of all time against civilization and progress.

The pending amendment will serve a beneficial purpose. It will place our Government in the attitude of extending the olive branch to the nations of the earth; it will set an example which may awaken a reaction against the present unbridled tendency to indefensible military enterprises; it will enable all people to begin a lasting movement to eliminate force and substitute reason as the controlling element in determining differences between nations. Let this opportunity pass, and it will never return, but we shall be committed to a policy which will plague us forever and will tend more and more to divert us from those useful pursuits that tend to elevate and promote the happiness of mankind, while our thoughts and energies are exerted to repel enemies more imaginary than real. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by way of substitute by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAWNEY) there were—ayes 63, noes 130.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KEIFER) there were—ayes 51, noes 135.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, when the bill was under consideration a point of order was made against the proviso beginning on page 4 in line 1. The point of order was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], whom I do not see here at present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois informed the Chair that he withdrew the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then I ask unanimous consent to return to that proviso, for the purpose of offering it as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to restore the paragraph which was stricken out of the bill on a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 1, after the word "eleven," insert: "Provided, That the salaries of the members of said commission on the part of the United States shall be fixed by the President, and the amount appropriated for the payment of salaries and other expenses hereunder shall be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of State; that said commission or any member thereof shall have power to administer oaths and to take evidence on oath whenever deemed necessary in any proceeding or inquiry or matter within its jurisdiction under said treaty, and said commission shall be authorized to compel the attendance of witnesses in any proceedings before it or the production of books and papers when necessary by application to the circuit court of the United States for the circuit within which such session is held, which court is hereby empowered and directed to make all orders and issue all processes necessary and appropriate for that purpose."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. OLMSTED having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MANN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House bill 32009, and had instructed him to report the bill back to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the amendments and the bill to final passage, and on that motion I ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota moves the adoption of the amendments and demands the previous question upon them and upon the bill to final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill with the following instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York moves that the bill be recommitted with the following instructions, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Recommit with instruction to report forthwith, amended by adding, after "dollars," line 18, page 229, the following:

"Provided, That no part of this sum shall be available for expenditure until the President shall have determined, after proper endeavor by and through the treaty-making power vested in him by the Constitution, that he is unable to negotiate and conclude a treaty with a majority of the leading maritime nations of the world joining the United States in guaranteeing the proper preservation, protection, and safety of the Panama Canal and the entrances thereto, including protection from danger of blockade and the protection of vessels entering or desiring to enter therein, and the commerce thereon, in time of war as in time of peace, and other stipulations and provisions deemed necessary to protect the United States in its ownership, possession, control, sanitation, right to police, and to perpetually maintain said canal and the entrances thereto for the uses and purposes for which it is being constructed or may be adapted, and guaranteeing at all times to the signatory powers thereto the full and free use of said canal upon such terms and under such rules, regulations, and government as may be prescribed by the United States.

"If the President be unable to negotiate such a treaty he shall so signify by proclamation, made in the usual form, to the people of the United States, and then, and not until then, shall this appropriation be available for expenditure for the purposes named therein."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, and upon that he demands the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion offered by the gentleman from New York, to recommit with instructions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 81, nays 123, answered "present" 10, not voting 170, as follows:

YEAS—81.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 10691) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Also that the Senate further insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. 31856) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives and agreed to the conference asked for by the House, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. TILLMAN.

The message further announced that the Senate agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 31856) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1342) placing H. M. Plunkett, assistant engineer, United States Navy, on the retired list with an advanced rank, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had, on February 24, 1911, approved the following bills and joint resolution:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 26, 1911.

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock noon by the Clerk, Hon. Alexander McDowell, who read the following letter:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1911.

I hereby designate Hon. J. A. T. HULL as Speaker pro tempore for this day.

J. G. CANNON, Speaker.

Mr. HULL of Iowa assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art supremely wise and good, just and merciful, pure and holy, our God and our Father, we thank Thee that no night of sorrow can obscure the light of Thy countenance from those who put their trust in Thee. No disappointment so deep, so poignant, that Thou canst not turn to hope. Hence we pray most fervently for those who were bound by the ties of love and friendship to the departed statesmen, who strove earnestly to reflect in their lives and deeds the image of their Maker. Grant that the history recorded this day may be an inspiration to those who read, to pure motives, clean living, and noble endeavor, that, though dead, their works may live and bear the fruits of the spirit thus reflected in their lives. Help us, we beseech Thee, so to live that when we pass to the great beyond we shall be missed and cherished by those who knew and loved us, and song of praises we will ever give to Thee in the name of Him who taught us to live well, and when the summons comes to pass serenely on with perfect faith and confidence in Thee, O God, our Father. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE SENATOR DOLLIVER.

Mr. HUBBARD of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions (H. Res. 997).

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER, late a Member of the United States Senate from the State of Iowa, which occurred at his home, in the city of Fort Dodge, October 15, 1910.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given to pay tribute to his memory.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public service the House, at the conclusion of the memorial exercises of the day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general leave for five days be granted to Members to print remarks on the life and character of the late Senator DOLLIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that leave be given for five days for Members to print remarks on the life and character of Senator DOLLIVER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUBBARD of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the first I knew of JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER, or J. P., as he was familiarly called, was about 1882. In my memory he was then a tall, almost slender, yet powerful youth, with a great voice not yet touched in its melody with that certain roughness which later became habitual. He was full of a boyish fun and already looked out upon life with that quaintly cynical humor, which saw the absurd in every sham, the queer and almost comical self-deception in every wrong, and half overlooked the sham, and half forgave the wrong for the delight he found in their very absurdity.

I met him through that most lovable of men, Maurice D. O'Connell, his lifelong mentor and friend, and even now remember the prankish play of wit and fun with which the young fellow tickled and teased the older man. At home he was the life of every crowd, the joy of the town, welcome alike to the philosophers of the drygoods box, as they reasoned sagely of "fate, free-will, fore-knowledge absolute," and to the boys out for a good time.

The first notes of his eloquence were sounding. With all their apparent ease, they were the results of arduous training. I have been told that in those days it was his wont, whenever in reading or in his own meditations or in talk, he encountered a striking thought, a witty turn, a suggestive parallel, to note it upon a slip of paper, pin this conspicuously on his bedroom wall, and rehearse it over and over until it became a part of his mental furniture. He called these his "repertoire," and would recite them oratorically to his intimates with all conceivable variations, as might some violinist strive for perfect expression upon the trembling strings. His earlier speeches quivered with epigram, each sentence rounded, complete; an argument in a witty phrase; an heroic picture in a gleaming word. Such was the speech at the Republican State convention in 1884 which first introduced him to the State and sent him to Congress in 1890. So light and joyous were these children of his brain that men in their laughter and applause forgot the earnest purpose behind the wit and satire. Stupid commonplace exacted the usual bitter penalty from him who had the wisdom to make men laugh. He was an earnest man, although he did not clothe his earnestness in pompous phrase. He laughed in the face of poverty, yet took prudent and anxious care for those of his own household.

To his revered father he was a son indeed; to his brothers and sisters he was a brother indeed. Who that has been privileged to see it can ever forget the reverent care which surrounded the aged and crippled father? His was the seat of honor, the voice of authority. To the day of his death he ruled like a patriarch in the household of his son. And wife and children—who shall tread within the circle of their grief? With what brave humor he took up the seeming burdens of life and bore them so gladly that they ceased to be burdens and became as precious adornments.

Born into the Methodist Church, in all his jovial and free commerce with the world he never wandered from his Father's house. Nowhere did he appear to better advantage than in the councils of his church, and nowhere did he render more faithful service. In my own town is a college, struggling upward from weakness into strength—Morningside College. To no man after Bishop Lewis does this growing foundation owe more than to JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER. Last fall, even as his body lay waiting for the grave, there came a new era to the little college, an era of expanding life under Luther A. Freeman. At the inauguration of Dr. Freeman Senator DOLLIVER was to speak. When his name was reached on the program, the great audience rose with one impulse and stood with tearful eyes, a blessing on their lips. His memory will linger long as a fragrance in those halls.

Judge Birdsall, GILBERT HAUGEN, and I spent a winter with him here in Washington, dwelling in his house. We called ourselves the Pirates. What boyish, simple fun we had. And in the evening when the fire was blazing in the grate, how prodigally he poured forth the riches of his mind. How wide his reading. There seemed to be no subject he had not studied, no theme he had not pondered.

This was the year of the rate bill. There came to Senator DOLLIVER, in the struggle over that bill, a broadening vision, a fuller realization of the tremendous forces at work upon a revolution in the life of the Republic. Then for the first time he feared. Then for the first time there dwelt upon his lips the phrase, afterwards so familiar to the end, "the integrity, the freedom, of the American market place." He saw the consolidation of the railway, shop, and bank, of transportation, industry, and finance, into one huge, overmastering system, dictating to men and to communities the terms of living. Of course the people are masters if they will, but will they? Can they endure the steady, unceasing, organized attack of concentrated interests? Can they endure with patience, stand the brunt of hard times, go hungry, if need be, for a principle, or will they, like some huge, unwieldy animal caught in the nets of the hunter, struggle wildly for a time and then supinely yield to him who gives food—"bread and circuses?"

I do him wrong if I depict any sudden, Saul-like conversion to a new gospel. The railroad question was not new to him. As he himself says:

> The fact is, I live in a community which for 40 years has been studying the railroad question. We got started in the study in the time of Gov. Cyrus C. Carpenter. He gave us a sentence in Iowa that has been more upon the lips of our people than any other political maxim, a phrase, if you please, "the skeleton in the corncrib."

When in 1906 Senator DOLLIVER had the fight for the rate bill he did it with the ripest knowledge and with a matured and earnest purpose:

> To prevent, with all the power that this Government has or can acquire, those abuses which in 20 years have converted our market place into an industrial oligarchy more powerful even than the Government of the United States.

So with the tariff debate he was upon no new ground; no new question surprised him. He was the devoted follower of Blaine. He was the loving friend of William McKinley. He had defended to the uttermost the Kasson treaties when men's voices were dumb. He had spoken in warning to deaf ears. Had the policies of Blaine and McKinley, had the treaties of reciprocity negotiated through them been honestly interpreted and honestly maintained, we should not to-day have the tariff question agitating and vexing the business of the land. I was in the Iowa Legislature when that body named him Senator. I heard his speech of acceptance. No one there present can forget the profound impression made by his deep earnestness.

> The design of protective tariff laws—> is to prevent our home industries from being overborne by the competition of foreign producers, and it may safely be said that no American factory making an unequal or even precarious fight with its foreign rivals will ever look in vain for help and defense to the people of Iowa. But we are not blind to the fact that, in many lines of industry, tariff rates which in 1897 were reasonable have already become unnecessary and even absurd. They remain on the statute books, not as a shield for the safety of domestic labor, but as a weapon of offense against the American market place itself.

He said—

That last sentence might stand as the text for his whole tariff contention. He came to that great controversy armed cap-a-pie, not so much in any new awakening as in response to an aroused public opinion. He was in the full maturity of his powers. No English-speaking orator of his time was so equipped with every resource of his art. The theme was one upon which he had meditated long and earnestly. He had helped to frame the Dingley tariff, and for many months before the extra session began, had studied every detail of the schedules. So when the time for action came, no other man alive was so well prepared. The months that followed revealed him to his countrymen as he had not been known before. The harvest time had come. The climax of it all was that last great speech when he seemed to rise to prophetic heights, when doubts vanished and faith reigned. He cried aloud with exultation:

> For the day is coming—it is a good deal nearer than many think—when a new sense of justice, new inspirations, new volunteer enthusiasms for good government shall take possession of the hearts of all our people. The time is at hand when the laws will be respected by great and small alike; when fabulous millions, piled hoard upon hoard, by cupidity and greed, and used to finance the ostentations of modern life, shall be no longer a badge even of distinction, but of discredit rather, and it may be of disgrace; a good time coming, when this people shall so frame their statutes as to protect alike the enterprises of rich and poor in the greatest market place which God has ever given to His children, and when the rule of justice, intrenched in the habits of the whole community, will put away all unseemly fears of panic and disaster when the enforcement of the laws is suggested by the courts. It is a time nearer than we dare to think. A thousand forces are making for it. It is the fruitage of these Christian centuries, the fulfillment of the prayers and dreams of the men and women who have laid the foundations of this Commonwealth, and with infinite sacrifice maintained these institutions.

This was his swan song. A few weeks more and he lay at rest among his loving and beloved people. So passed this master of speech, this gentle, human, loving man, with whom little children played, with whom his neighbors joked and gossiped, toward whom a nation turned with listening hearts. For him I refuse to mourn, rather would I uplift a song of triumph, thanksgiving, and praise. He hath fought the good fight.

Mr. WOODS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this day has been set apart to honor the memory of Senator JONATHAN PRENTISS DOLLIVER, who, though born of humble parentage, became one of the mightiest forces in the Nation for better government and the uplift of American citizens.

What may be said here to-day will add little to his fame. If we can but call the attention of the American youth to the great career of Senator DOLLIVER the day will have been well spent. The record of his life will be an inspiration to every boy in the Nation, whether among the high or yet among the lowly and the poor.

Mr. DOLLIVER was born February 6, 1858. His father, Rev. James J. Dolliver, was a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church; his mother's maiden name was Eliza Jane Brown. The place of Mr. DOLLIVER's birth was on a farm a few miles from Kingwood, Preston County, W. Va. When he was 12 years old the family moved to Morgantown, in that State, where he attended the public schools. He finished his education in the University of West Virginia, graduating from that institution in 1875 at the age of 17. After graduating from the university he took up the study of law and was admitted to the bar in 1878. He then began looking about for a suitable location, selecting the little city of Fort Dodge, Iowa, where the hills, undulating back from the river Des Moines, were an ever pleasant reminder of his early home.

Mr. DOLLIVER brought to his chosen State a purpose to succeed, a character seasoned by the vicissitudes that come to the families of ministers of the gospel in following their calling in the sparsely settled districts, a strong constitution, the result of clean living and the invigorating air of a mountain climate. Born on a farm, spending his early boyhood in the rough and hilly country, he learned to love nature for its own sake. Little wonder that later on in life his great speeches were filled with the music of the songs of birds and the ripple of the mountain brooks. His nature partook of those early surroundings, which supplied him with the many qualities that afterwards gained for him national recognition, for there was in his eloquence and word pictures the grandeur of the mountain storm and the beauty of the valleys. In his home life flowers bloomed in his conversation and the clouds drifted away.

In the year 1878 he moved to the State of Iowa, the soundest, sweetest, and most wholesome Commonwealth in the American Union. From the moment he arrived in Fort Dodge until the day of his death, October 15, 1910, Mr. DOLLIVER was identified with every forward movement. He endured and even enjoyed the hardships that come to a young lawyer. In his case, as in the case of others beginning the practice of law, he had plenty of time to devote to the politics of his county.

He began at once to attract the attention of the men who took an interest in government, not only for his ability to speak, but on account of the soundness of his counsel. The beginning of his political career, however, may be said to date from the time he was selected as chairman of the State Republican convention in 1884. His address to the delegates was widely commented on, and from that time forward he was in demand as a speaker at political and patriotic gatherings. The prominence thus given him resulted in his nomination and election as a Member of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-first Congress. The broader field afforded as a Member of the lower House spurred him to put forth his best efforts. A brilliant mind like Representative DOLLIVER possessed required such a field not afforded in any other avocation or single occupation. This was the work he loved, the field he sought, and it became his life work. Had his ambition been the building up of a great fortune he would have attained his goal; had it been but the quest of fame he could have been content to rest, for his eloquence had already supplied him this. To his credit it must be said that these vanities had no attraction for him—he took a broader and better view of life; he labored only to serve his country and his fellow man, and to solve, if possible, the economic problems that confront the Nation. Throwing all his energy into his work it is not to be wondered at that he soon made his influence felt in the House of Representatives, so that when a vacancy occurred in the Senate Representative DOLLIVER seemed to be the logical candidate.

On August 23, 1900, he was appointed United States Senator to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Gear. His previous training in the House prepared him to take up at once the work in the Senate. Constituted as he was and coming from humble surroundings, he worked and voted for the welfare of the common citizen, not being blinded by ambition or personal success. Naturally a student, he was necessarily a great reader, and enjoyed not only the works of the masters of philosophy and political economy, but he enjoyed as well the works of fiction and the current comments of the magazine and newspaper. In the Senate Chamber when Senator DOLLIVER arose to speak there fell an expectant hush, and even though the subject was of minor importance his handling of the matter, gilded with the touch of eloquence, made the driest question of state entertaining. His quick wit and wide knowledge made him a master in the verbal brushes and debates. He could stem and turn the tide of argument by his ability to select the weak point in his opponents, and could paint their position in such a ridiculous light that he never failed to bring forth applause. When matters of great moment were before the country for decision, Senator DOLLIVER set at once to work to secure all available information, and viewed the question from every standpoint before attempting its solution. He was an untiring worker, and when he had collected all his data and properly arranged it for summing up, it could be depended upon that when he presented it to the Senate that every phase of the question had been considered. It was not to the Senate alone, however, that he spoke; the Nation was his audience chamber and the 90,000,000 Americans his auditors.

Being of a genial disposition, he avoided all useless arguments and controversies, and in questions of state was slow to discuss the matter until thoroughly convinced of the correctness of his position. When he had once concluded the proper course to pursue he could not be swerved, by friendship or other consideration, from his purpose of championing the cause. While he felt keenly any coldness on the part of his friends and their disapproval of his attitude, he never allowed that fact to lessen his vigorous support of righteous legislation. I have often beheld him during a debate on some great question, like the tariff or transportation, when his whole being would be summoned to action by the knowledge of his own responsibility to see that justice was done; the light of understanding was in his eye and righteous determination in his heart. His aim and endeavor was the restoration and continuance of the power of the individual citizen, and to do right because it was right. He accomplished much for the benefit of his countrymen and the common people and endeavored to eradicate the cause of inequality to the individual and make his country a place of equal opportunity and enjoyment of citizenship to all. It has been remarked that Senator DOLLIVER surely enjoyed the full measure of public honor, but I believe that had he lived his country would have further crowned his career with the highest honor that is within the gift of the American people.

In reviewing the life of Senator DOLLIVER and summing up his career we are too apt to see but the public side of the man and forget entirely his home life. Senator DOLLIVER was married in 1895 to Miss Louisa Pearson, and to this union was born three children, Margaret, Francis, and George Prentiss. I love to think of him in his home, where, in the early evening with his family and in conversation with them, he would receive the inspiration for his labors the following day. It was his habit, later in the evening, to gather about him his books, the works of masters and the humbler poets; there amid the solitude, surrounded by these mute friends, his soul would receive all the wonders of the creation of the human mind. And thus at some future time in the Senate his memory, as treasurer, was always ready to pay the drafts made upon it in debate.

Not long ago I went down the Potomac River to Mount Vernon, the last earthly home of George Washington. I stood on the beautiful slope that rises up from the river, and, while moved by the inspiring surroundings, I meditated upon the great purposes and the splendid achievements of the departed President. I was impressed with the maxim that the good that men do live after them. On the southern hillside stands the tomb of Washington, where his earthly remains have reposed for more than a century. On the tomb are inscribed these words: "Though ye are dead, yet shall ye live."

That motto could find no more substantial vindication than the life of Washington, and no fitter epitaph could be invented for his tomb. It embodies the spirit of fame, the power of example, the permanence of achievement, and the immortality of unselfishness. The influences of the nameless dead linger with us still; they sway and direct our course by their precepts and examples. In the moment of doubt we consult precedent, and precedent is but the deeds of those who have gone before.

In the city of Fort Dodge they are building a monument to commemorate the great work Senator DOLLIVER has done in behalf of the American Government and its citizens, upon which I hope the sculptor will inscribe the same epitaph as is upon the tomb of Washington, "Though ye are dead, yet shall ye live." The people of Iowa will always take pride in pointing to the life of Senator DOLLIVER as exemplary. I am glad they are building that monument in his home city. Monuments, however, are not needed to perpetuate his memory. The work of his great, noble mind and heart will be unforgotten when the monument above his resting place shall have crumbled into dust.

Senator JONATHAN PRENTISS DOLLIVER has gone, his work is finished, but the influences of his life will become more and more potent for good. The world is better for his having lived. In years to come, from his toil and sowing the American people will garner a rich harvest.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, the great State of Iowa gives praise to-day to the memory of her honored son. And well she may, for the fame of his brilliant career has brought honor to the State he loved so well; and yet Senator DOLLIVER belonged to us all.

When the news of his untimely taking off was flashed across the wires every humble home in our broad land lost a champion and every fireside a defender. His work was national; his fame was world-wide, and, coming as I do from the western plains far beyond the limits of his adopted State, I bring to his bier a token of honor and respect from those who knew him best for what he stood and loved him most for what he did. We admired his statesmanship; we loved him for his patriotic courage; we believed in his wisdom; we trusted his fidelity, and we would have gladly followed in his lead in every struggle for the advancement of human rights and the preservation of our liberties. We believed in his destiny, and had he been spared to a grateful people, their faith would have placed him at the helm and made him the Chief Magistrate of our common country.

The record of his public service is known in every humble home, and in the great West at many a hearthstone, as evening shadows fall and the little brood is gathered around maternal knee to say the evening prayer, the childish heart is cheered anew to hear again from mother's lips the story of DOLLIVER's life. He is gone, but the lesson of his life is with us yet, and every struggle that he made in our behalf will still remain as shining stars to guide aright the weary footsteps of those who follow and those who are to come.

I saw him last just at the adjournment of the preceding session. He told me then that overwork had well-nigh broken down his strength; and now it seems to me, in looking back, that then he spoke in prophetic vision when he said that unless he at once sought rest and quiet his days on earth were numbered. He had been laboring then through two almost continuous sessions with unceasing toil, and well he knew that he had reached the limit of human endurance. He had decided then to take a well-earned rest and rebuild his wasted strength for the work of the present session; but duty called and he obeyed. He knew the danger of his course, but without consideration for his own welfare or even his own life he plunged into a vigorous campaign in defense of those principles which he conscientiously believed to be right. With labor unceasing and with courage undaunted he boldly faced the danger that he well knew was liable to bring the unanswerable summons that came too soon. He sacrified his life upon the altar of his country as truly, as bravely, and as nobly as any knight who ever faced a foe upon the field of battle. Overburdened with the cares of state, on the topmost hill of life's pathway, while the sun was still shining in the zenith, he laid his burden down and sank to eternal rest.

It is sometimes difficult for mortal man to understand the wisdom of a mysterious Providence when such men are stricken down at the noonday hour of life, and yet it has been the fate of many of our most useful and illustrious men. It almost seems like a denial of justice to strike them down before they have heard the shouts of triumph from those who follow and before they have felt the crown of victory upon the brow. But, after all, when we consider the brief span of life's existence, it matters but little whether the summons comes at noon or whether it takes us off as the sun is sinking in the west.

But whenever it does come, if we can look back over the road we have trod and see along the pathway the flowers of love, of justice, and of mercy that have been planted by our own hands to blossom and to bloom for those who follow, then life shall not have been lived in vain. We can honor our illustrious dead most by living the life they would have us lead and remaining true to the principles for which they labored and for which they died. These occasions are not for the good of the dead, but for the benefit of the living. In the face of death we all realize our weakness. It is well for struggling mortals to touch elbows around the open grave. It drives from out the heart selfishness and greed, it frees the mind of anger and of hate. It reminds us that in but a few days we all must follow; that the rich, the poor, the small, the great, must all meet upon the common level in answer to the summons; and that after all life is too short to carry in the heart any envy or ill-will against our fellow man. It teaches the doctrine of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and standing here, as it were, beside the open grave, with life's tenure unknown, but with eternity in view, let me say:

When I am old—and O, how soon
Will life's sweet morning yield to noon,
And noon's broad, fervid, earnest light
Be shaded in the solemn night!
Till like a story well-nigh told
Will seem my life, when I am old.

When I am old—perhaps ere then
I shall be missed from haunts of men;
Perhaps my dwelling will be found
Beneath the green and quiet mound;
My name by stranger hands enrolled
Among the dead—ere I am old.

Ere I am old, O let me give
My life to learning how to live!
Then shall I meet with willing heart
An early summons to depart,
Or find my lengthened days consoled
By God's sweet peace—when I am old.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, in the early eighties the country schoolhouse campaign was at its height in Iowa. In those days the farmer did not have the telephone or rural mail service. He was not taking the daily newspaper or magazine. The family reading consisted of the weekly, which usually did not devote an extravagant space to political affairs. This made it necessary to carry the campaign into the country precincts, and few were the schoolhouses near or remote that did not have a meeting. It was a great training school. Many of the noted men of Iowa—some who have since sat in the Cabinet or occupied the Speaker's chair or stood with "The applause of listening Senates to command"—commenced their public career in the country schoolhouse.

In the year in mind the managers of the Republican Party in my home county heard of a young man in Fort Dodge who had acquired some local reputation as a speaker and secured him for a series of schoolhouse speeches. Reports of the meetings reached the county seat and created so much interest that a closing rally was arranged for Saturday night. I attended the meeting and, for the first time, listened to the matchless eloquence of JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER.

Soon after he was chosen temporary chairman of the Republican State convention, and from the date of his speech delivered on that occasion his career may be said to date. His rise to prominence was sudden, but his tenure secure. How few the public men of to-day who can command an audience anywhere in our land and how few of this number could do so 20 years ago. How very few, in all our history, whose hold on the public continued with increasing power for more than a decade. DOLLIVER answered this test. Each year witnessed a steady and certain growth. From his recorded speeches you can trace the expanding intellect, the ripening wisdom, the accumulating knowledge, and increasing power with which his career was characterized.

DOLLIVER'S achievements as an orator may be attributed to both natural endowment and personal attainment. He was gifted with rare intellectual faculties, an unbounded faith, a picturesque imagination, a unique humor, and besides had both a disposition and capacity for work. He acquired a storehouse of information along broad lines of history, science, biography, and literature. He was a student of social, economic, and political problems. He was unusually gifted in anecdote, homely illustration, and personal reminiscence; and all were so card-indexed in his memory that they seemed to come forth without effort just at the right time. The element of surprise was always present. You dwelt in expectancy. He would pass in easy rapidity from the most common and grotesque illustration to classic reference or philosophic observation. In this respect he was the same in private conversation as in public address.

During the latter years of his service he gave more attention to debate—the greatest crucible of a speaker's powers and resources—for then the moorings are severed and you must stand alone. DOLLIVER'S success in the forensic arena surprised even his friends. It was there that all of his natural and acquired resources were brought into play. He was equipped with the weapons of attack and defense. His debates during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-first Congress will be historic. Even his opponents and those against whom his attacks were directed admit his claims to greatness.

The purposes of this hour do not permit an extended analysis of the varied elements which merged in the ultimate fact of his power either as a debater or platform orator. His power could only be appreciated by those who came under its immediate presence, for in action his whole being seemed a part of his spoken word.

Pure and eloquent blood
Spoke in his cheek and so distinctly wrought,
That one might almost say his body thought.

The late Senator Ingalls may have surpassed him in satire and invective; Tom Corwin, in humor; Wendell Phillips, in sustained strains of lofty patriotic appeal; Webster, in the depth and profundity of his reasoning; but in the peculiar blending of all these various attributes DOLLIVER stands alone. He had no predecessor, and contemporary oratory discloses no successor.

It is impossible to measure the influence exerted by the orator. The writer can be judged by his books, the jurist by his decisions, the statesman by his measures, but the influence exerted by the orator is intangible. He appears before the crowded auditorium for an hour or so, passes on, and no one can tell how many have felt the impress of some new thought, some new hope; how many have been inspired to better things, or gathered new courage to go forth and battle for the right. Each life has but few intense moments, but in those few moments there is a rebirth whose influence goes on and on.

In the addresses of Senator DOLLIVER there was a vein of optimism. His buoyant faith forbade the contrary. It was natural for him to look upon the bright side. He had a cheerful and hopeful philosophy of life, and this was radiated in whatever circle he moved. There was nothing depressing in his message, and this was particularly true when addressing young people, the boys and girls who were concluding their high school or university course, for on such occasions he transmitted to the minds and hearts of his young hearers a spirit of gratitude for the possibilities of our free institutions, inspired confidence to go forth into the battle of life, and held out to each and all the goal which could be attained through lives of virtue, industry, and courage.

To hear DOLLIVER was a stimulus for higher culture, better citizenship, and purer ideals of government. With him patriotism was almost a passion—patriotism in its broad and noble sense, that which stands for righteousness in public as well as private affairs. Viewed from this standpoint, who can estimate or measure the influence he exerted on society.

Others who have been associated with him during his career in the House, as well as in the Senate, have spoken of his public service as a legislator. He stood for justice; he fought for good government; he championed the cause of the people and of humanity in the broadest sense; he pleaded for that equality of opportunity which would plant the seed of hope in the humblest heart. In the storm center of controversy he stood erect. He was one of the central figures in an epoch-making period of our history and played a conspicuous part in the consideration of its important constructive legislation. "His name is enrolled in the Capitol," and no words of mine can add luster to his fame. It is sufficient to say that when some future historian writes the story of these times the name of JONATHAN PRENTISS DOLLIVER will be given a notable place.

DOLLIVER loved his adopted State and was beloved by it. Few men in the history of Iowa have been held in such affectionate regard. The reason for this lay not so much in his public service and achievements as in his undefinable personality. He had a cordial greeting and hearty handclasp for all. He was easy of approach. Around him was no self-imposed barricade. He lived in the open. He had a guest chamber reserved for all who sought the hospitality of his friendship. There was ever an outcropping of boyish good feeling. Kindliness breathed in his words and was reflected in his manner. He did not cherish hatred, but used the strength thus saved as a magnet to draw his friends closer. His contests left no personal sting. Out of the bitterness of controversies arose the charity of the generous foe. Victory did not conceit him, nor defeat disturb his equipoise.

He was a many-sided man. He loved the varied phases of life. He was at home either in the drawing-room or the country store, in the marble halls of state or the cornfields of Iowa, with the greatest scholars, divines, and leaders of our time, or the unlettered fisherman, or the lowly workman with face and hands begrimed with honest toil, and responded with equal interest to every environment. He was genuinely and intensely human.

No one could know the filial love and reverence of DOLLIVER for his venerable father, and his devotion to wife, children, brothers, sisters, and friends, without forgetting all other things in admiration of these qualities of the man. These things were known to the people of Iowa. They are the real basis of friendship and love and faithful followers. These qualities shone to best advantage when alone with his friends, "the world forgetting, by the world forgot." It is in such moments that the soul feels and the mind thinks aloud.

DOLLIVER'S inheritance and early training shaped his life. He was born in West Virginia during the days when it was the border line between the two great contending forces of this country over the greatest moral issue of the age. His father was a Methodist minister—a circuit rider of the old days—and had that simple and intense faith of which apostles are made. DOLLIVER inherited these traits. He was strongly religious in the broad sense, and faith seemed to be his guiding star, and to this many of his friends attribute his success.

A short time before his death he was walking in the evening with one of his closest friends over the farm whose hills and fields and trees he loved so well, and where he sought refuge from the many pressing cares of public life. He was conversing in all the abandonment of confiding friendship, when suddenly he paused and, turning to his friend, said: Do you know the most beautiful thing that was ever written? I'll tell you what it is:

Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar
When I put out to sea.

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell,
When I embark;

For though from out our bourne of Time and Place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face,
When I have crossed the bar.

Recalling this scene afterwards, his friend remarked that it seemed as though he must have felt at that time the shadows gathering about him.

I shall never forget the scene at the grave side of DOLLIVER. It was a cold, rainy, drear October day. It seemed as though nature itself was in mourning. At the conclusion of the simple burial service Mrs. Dolliver, stepping to the side of Bishop McDowell, asked him to lead in singing the hymn "We Shall Meet in the Sweet By and By," and as he did so Mrs. Dolliver and the brother and sister and other members of the family and then the friends who had gathered there joined in the singing. As the sad and broken-hearted circle stood around the grave with its lowering casket laden with loving flowers at the moment of final parting with all that was mortal of the loved husband, father, brother, and friend, the words of that beautiful, hopeful, and consoling hymn, borne on voices bathed with tears and freighted with grief, created an impression on my mind which time can never efface. It told better than any words can describe that indefinable faith which was the sustaining power and consolation of the Dolliver family, for only such a faith could sing such a song under such circumstances. It robbed the grave of its terrors, when faith lifted our eyes to the reunion when "we shall meet in the sweet by and by."

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this is the second time in a period of two years that our delegation has assembled to pay a tribute of respect to a deceased Senator of our State. On a former occasion we met to commemorate the life and service to the Nation of the late Senator Allison, whose death came at a ripe old age after a period of ill health, and his death was not unexpected. To-day we are here for a similar purpose—to pay a tribute of respect to the late Senator DOLLIVER, whose sudden and unexpected death came as a blow to the people of the State and Nation at a time when the eyes of the public were focused on him as a commanding figure in the United States Senate, a position attained by his unusual ability and industry.

Senator DOLLIVER was not a native of Iowa; he was reared in West Virginia, where he secured his education, finishing in the university of that State. He then moved to Fort Dodge, where he engaged in the practice of law, and where he lived up to the time of his death.

It was fitting that the end should come amid scenes so dear to him, surrounded by people all of whom were his friends, who had seen him rise from the obscurity of a young lawyer to the highest position within the gift of the State.

His public career started at an early age; he had not been long in Iowa until the opportunity offered to show his power as a speaker. He was chosen temporary chairman of a State convention, and his address on that occasion demonstrated his power as a speaker and paved the way for his future political success.

Senator DOLLIVER'S services in Congress covered a period of some 20 years, 10 of which were as a Member of this body, where he was loved and esteemed for his genial, companionable disposition, and admired for his skill and ability as a debater. On the death of Senator Gear, he was chosen to fill the vacancy, where he served with distinction until the time of his death.

He first attracted national attention when he toured the country in the campaign of 1884, speaking from the same platform with Gen. Logan, who was in that campaign a candidate for Vice President. Since that time he participated in every campaign and spoke in all parts of the country. He was known to the people of the country at large as an orator of unusual eloquence and a debater of great skill, but to those who enjoyed the pleasure of a personal acquaintance he disclosed many distinguishing characteristics. He was an optimist in its fullest sense and always looked on the bright side of things. His bright sayings and humor enlivened any company in which he might be thrown. These traits made him most companionable and endeared him to all who were fortunate enough to enjoy his friendship. He was proud of Iowa, and her people loved and honored him, and all join in deploring his untimely death.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, it is the custom of the House and Senate to eulogize their Members who have passed away. It is the custom to speak nothing but good of the dead, and pay tribute to the qualities which endeared them to us in life. In speaking of Senator DOLLIVER, however, the highest tribute that language can express is merited to the last degree. Because he lived, the door of opportunity is opened a little wider for every American boy. The future is a little brighter for every man who earns his bread by honest toil. He was a tower of strength to the cause of a "government of and by and for the people." One of our greatest orators, a man of remarkable intellectual ability, an indefatigable worker, devoting his talents to the service of his country, we shall not soon see his like again.

The last years of his life were his best years—years full of unselfish service for the public good. He felt weighing heavily upon him the burdens of 90,000,000 of people. With keen vision he saw "the wrongs that round us lie" in our national and social life, and with untiring energy, with a zeal like unto that of the Apostles of old, he sought to correct them. He saw that this Republic could not endure unless the doctrine of equality of opportunity for all men shall again become one of its chief foundation stones. Because of DOLLIVER'S life politics are to-day upon a higher level, and the coming of that day is hastened—

When each man seeks his own in all men's good,
And all men work in noble brotherhood.

DOLLIVER was not a pessimist. He was not a painter of dark pictures of our future. On the contrary, he saw a brighter and better day coming than had ever been known—a day when this should be in a greater degree than ever before a land of equal opportunity, where all would share in the fruits of our prosperity according to their merits and habits of industry.

In his last great speech in the Senate, last June, he gave expression to this in these words, which have already been quoted by Judge HUBBARD, but they will bear repetition:

The day is coming—it is a good deal nearer than many think—when a new sense of justice, new inspirations, new volunteer enthusiasms for good government shall take possession of the hearts of all our people. The time is at hand when the laws will be respected by great and small alike; when fabulous millions piled hoard upon hoard by cupidity and greed and used to finance the ostentations of modern life shall be no longer a badge even of distinction but of discredit rather, and it may be of disgrace; a good time coming, when this people shall so frame their statutes as to protect alike the enterprises of rich and poor in the greatest market place which God has ever given to His children, and when the rule of justice, intrenched in the habits of the whole community, will put away all unseemly fears of panic and disaster, when the enforcement of the laws is suggested by the courts. It is a time nearer than we dare to think. A thousand forces are making for it. It is the fruitage of these Christian centuries, the fulfillment of the prayers and dreams of the men and women who have laid the foundations of this Commonwealth and with infinite sacrifice maintained these institutions.

DOLLIVER was not a rich man, but he left to his family and his countrymen a heritage more to be prized than dollars counted in millions—a record of service to his fellow men. By his life it has been proven again, as it has so many times in the past, that—

> A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches,
> And loving favour rather than silver or gold.

During the memorable tariff session of 1909 I had occasion to know something of Senator DOLLIVER's work. I had occasion to know that he and that little group of Senators associated with him were giving their very lives to the public service. During those sultry summer days they fought the people's battles during the day in the Senate, and after adjournment worked far into the night and even until morning preparing for the next day's struggle. They gave no thought to personal health or convenience. They were "soldiers of the common good" fighting for the public welfare with as much courage, with as much self-sacrifice, aye, with as much danger as the warrior patriot who faces the cannon's mouth upon the field of battle.

The struggle of that session and the succeeding one undermined DOLLIVER's health, and he is dead, sacrificing his life for his country as truly as any who died upon Bunker Hill or the field of Gettysburg.

In Senator DOLLIVER the country has lost a great statesman, a valiant soldier for the common welfare, and those of us who were privileged to know him have lost a personal friend.

> It is not gold, but only man
> Can make a people great and strong,
> Men who for truth and honor's sake
> Stand fast and suffer long.
> Brave men who work while others sleep,
> Who dare while others fly,
> These build a nation's pillars deep
> And lift them to the sky.

Such a man was DOLLIVER, and of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, there are occasions in human experience when the heart so overflows with sadness that it is difficult for the lips to perform their ordinary office. I am oppressed by such embarrassment at this hour when I undertake to render appropriate eulogium upon the life and character of the departed friend to whom I was so devotedly attached.

DOLLIVER is dead. His removal, just when opportunity for a larger and a nobler usefulness than any he had previously enjoyed opened with such assured promise before him, was a tragedy inconceivably sorrowful. The cruel billows roared his sunken ship as he entered mid-ocean, in the happiest, sunniest hour of all his voyage, and the imperial Commonwealth which delighted to decorate him with the rarest distinctions it had to confer is involved in inconsolable bereavement. For Iowa loved the man. He was her favorite son. Others are secure in her affectionate regard, but only DOLLIVER, the foremost orator in the world, was enshrined in the innermost recesses of her loyal heart.

He came to her in his early youth, an obscure stranger, uncouth and unsophisticated, from the mountain country of the Old Dominion. But he was not long destined to remain unknown. The State first became acquainted with him in 1884, when, at the annual convention of our party, he introduced himself to the consideration of the people in a philippic of such marvelous effectiveness that it is cherished yet as a masterpiece of controversial literature. A mere boy, I listened entranced by his fascinating eloquence, and cheered myself hoarse in the tremendous applause which approved his transcendent periods. It was a day of political delirium. Blaine was a candidate for the Presidency, and his adherents, overwhelmingly in the majority in Iowa, were inspired with a passionate abandon which has never since been equaled in our party contests. It was an epoch when extreme partisan conviction announced itself in extravagant public expression. One of the picturesque phrases in that wonderful address is in my memory at this moment: "When slavery died, the Democratic Party was too old to marry again." The dramatic scene which ensued is as vividly before me as though it had been enacted yesterday. The brilliant epigram appealing to emotions already aroused to intensity, the assembled thousands hysterical with rapturous excitement, and DOLLIVER, the impersonation of immeasurable energy, the apotheosis of infinite power!

From that moment to his death, his career was a matter of common concern, and it was a series of uninterrupted triumphs. In each recurring campaign he traversed the Republic from boundary to boundary, summoning the hosts of patriotism to renew their allegiance at the fountains of enthusiasm. He became at once the most conspicuous and interesting figure in the national arena. He was welcomed everywhere—from Maine to California—and everywhere the multitudes responded captive to his persuasive speech. In 1888 he was elected to this House, and after 13 years of distinguished service here he was transferred to the Senate of the United States, where he continued with increasing influence until the pallid messenger beckoned him to depart.

His eminent record in official station is familiar to his countrymen, and to them it is bequeathed as an inestimable heritage. I can not embark upon its detailed analysis now. We do not forget the qualities in which he was so unapproached, his learning so unusual in its variety, his intellect so unexcelled in its resources, his statesmanship so exceptional in its fruitfulness, his oratory so incomparable in its invective, his humor so irresistible in its satire; but now that he is finally and irrevocably gone, what we most remember was his integrity of heart under the temptations of preferment, his simplicity of soul under the blandishments of ambition, his serenity of spirit under the aspersions of criticism, his unselfish consecration to the service of his fellow men. From a private soldier in the ranks of conservatism he was evolved by the shock of battle into a principal trumpeter in the army of righteousness. His endowment was unprecedented, and he dedicated it all without reservation to the welfare of his people. He despised the wrong, no matter how formidably intrenched, and he exalted the right, no matter how seriously beleaguered. He loved his country, her history, her institutions, her citizenship; and he sacrificed himself to the uttermost for the establishment of her prosperity and honor. And just when wider avenues of enduring achievement invited him, the Divine Omnipotence called him home. He believed implicitly in the inspiration of the Scriptures, in the atonement through faith, and in the life everlasting. In the chastened sweetness of this memorial hour we can not doubt that as the dutiful son, the devoted husband, the indulgent father crossed to the bourn from which no traveler returns, his weary ears were gladdened by the triumphant benediction of the great Master, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter into the joy of thy Lord."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to add a word to the memory of the man I knew so well, and one for whom I have so profound an admiration. I knew Senator DOLLIVER before the great speech at the State convention that made him famous throughout the Nation. As a young man, after his first start in the local politics at Fort Dodge, his fame widened more rapidly than that of any man I have ever known in public life. To my mind his life furnishes another of the splendid examples of what can be accomplished in this country by the young man who is true to his own interests and labors for the advancement and upbuilding of what he believes to be for the good of the people. He had absolutely none of the powerful aids which sometimes push a young man forward. As has been said, his father was a Methodist circuit rider in the mountains of West Virginia. He worked his own way through college, he worked his own way through the study of law, taught school, or did any humble employment that came to his hand by which he maintained his own independence and his own self-respect. From these humble beginnings he came to be, at the early age of 52, a commanding figure in the national life of this great Republic.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want to speak of him more as a young man. When I first knew him it looked as if he had before him a long life, with his splendid physique and excellent habits. As a young man he had the power of winning men, of winning to himself the confidence and affection of the older public men of Iowa of that day. His relationship to Gov. Carpenter was referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. Gov. Carpenter was one of the men Iowa delighted to honor. Mr. DOLLIVER was a citizen of Fort Dodge, and when Gov. Carpenter was occupying the executive chair he was all the time looking to the upbuilding of the younger men of the State, and he was the friend that did more to promote the early interests of JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER than any other man in Iowa. And DOLLIVER won to himself the affectionate regard of all the older men and never aroused the jealousy of the younger. He won friends and kept them, and to me, as he passed from one advancement to another, and to his other friends in Iowa older than he, there was a cause of congratulation and rejoicing that honors came to him.

There was a time in his life, in 1900, when the Presidency was in his reach; and if he had been a self-seeking man, if he had pushed his own fortunes, if he had backed up the President of the United States, William McKinley, and his great political manager, Mark Hanna, in their desire to have him for the Vice Presidency, I do not believe that any power could have prevented his being Vice President, and stepping up from that place when the great President passed beyond, into the highest office of the Republic. Those of us who knew JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER have the firm belief that he would have discharged the duties of that high office so as to merit the plaudits of the entire American people. He was a Republican. He was on purely party questions a partisan, but he was beyond that a man that loved his fellow man. There is no man of the opposite party who ever charged JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER with doing him or his party any wrong. He met in fair debate all comers, and as has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the last years of his life disclosed the fact that as a debater he ranked among the very best this country has ever produced.

I want to say further, Mr. Speaker, that JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER'S success was not an accident. He was a close student all his life. In his younger days he laid the foundation of a broad culture so deep and well that when he builded the superstructure he had a fund to draw upon that was practically inexhaustible. No speech of his, no great effort of his was ever given to the public until it had passed through his great mind and had been revised and corrected and improved until it met the high criticism of his own judgment as something ready to give to the public. I know that in many cases men are misled with the belief that great men make but little preparation and speak out of the abundance of their great ability. No greater wrong can come to the young than to have that idea. There is no excellence without labor. JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER reached the highest excellence in his chosen walk of life because he shrank from no labor.

Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of great regret to many of his lifelong friends that the closing days of his life were somewhat embittered by the factional fights engendered in this country, but as the story of the past shall grow more dim, as the passions shall pass away, and the history of his time and life be written, there will be nothing to mar its perfect symmetry, nothing to cast the shadow upon his memory or his name. He was beloved in life and his memory will be cherished by those that live now and knew him, and his family will receive from the good people of Iowa and of the Nation the sympathy that should go to them, bereaved of this great husband and father and citizen and patriot.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune to know Senator DOLLIVER long and intimately. He and I were friends for many years, and his unexpected death was a great shock to me personally as well as a national loss to all the people of our country. Hence, on this memorable occasion I desire to place on record my sincere tribute to the memory of my friend and to say a few simple words regarding his life, his character, and his great public services to the Republic.

JONATHAN PRENTISS DOLLIVER was born near Kingwood, Preston County, Va. (now West Virginia), February 6, 1858; graduated in 1875 from the West Virginia University; was admitted to the bar in 1878; never held any political office until elected to the Fifty-first Congress as a Representative from the Tenth Congressional District of Iowa; was a Member of the House also in the Fifty-second, Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, and Fifty-sixth Congresses; on August 23, 1900, was appointed United States Senator to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. J. H. Gear; was elected January 21, 1902, to succeed himself; and reelected in 1907. Had he lived, his term of service would have expired on March 3, 1913. Such in brief is the record of this noble man and distinguished public servant, whose untimely death we mourn to-day.

Senator DOLLIVER was a true man, a lover of justice, a believer in the supremacy of law, a friend of the cause that lacked assistance. He stood for the principles of right, for fair play, and believed in the equal opportunity vouchsafed to everyone under the dome of the Union sky. He was an optimist—no skeptic, no scoffer, no cynic. He was broad and liberal in his views, had charity for all, trusted the people, and never lost faith in humanity. He believed the world was growing better. He knew himself, believed in the destiny of the Republic, and made the corner stone of his convictions that great cardinal principle—equal rights to all, special privileges to no one.

He hated cant and despised hypocrisy. He had no use for a trickster, a trimmer, or a trader. He had a sunshiny, genial disposition and a forgiving spirit that never harbored revenge. He had true eloquence and was one of the most effective orators of his time. He was a plain, simple man who loved mankind. He was an indulgent father, a loving husband, and a faithful friend. He will live in the hearts of those he left behind, and to do this is not to die. He was an indefatigable worker and succeeded in accomplishing what he undertook to do. He met Napoleon's test—he did things. He was a true friend of the plain people, the implacable foe of private monopoly, of discriminating legislation that robs the many for the benefit of the few, and he made the Constitution the north star of his political life. He was the fearless champion of the oppressed and lived for the good that he could do. He tried to lift his fellow man up to a higher plane and help him forward on the highway of progress and of civilization. He was a fearless man, and ever dared to do what he thought was right regardless of consequences. He was a faithful public official and died in the service of his country.

Senator DOLLIVER'S work is done. His career on earth is finished. He has run his course; he kept the faith; he fought the good fight; he has reaped his everlasting reward in the great beyond, and we, his friends, can all say truthfully, well done thou good and faithful servant, a grateful people will ever keep thy memory green.

In halls of state he stood for many years
Like fabled knight, his visage all aglow,
Receiving, giving sternly, blow for blow,
Champion of right! But from eternity's far shore
Thy spirit will return to join the strife no more.
Rest, citizen, statesman, rest; thy troubled life is o'er.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, in the untimely death of Senator J. P. DOLLIVER Iowa loses one of her most faithful and devoted public servants, the Senate its most powerful debater, the Nation a patriotic and fearless leader, and humanity an advocate who was untiring in his zeal for its welfare and betterment. Stricken at the zenith of his powers as an orator and statesman, his death at the early age of 52 years is greatly to be lamented, and his memory will long be revered not only by the people of Iowa, but of the Nation generally.

The life story of Senator DOLLIVER is an inspiration to the youth of the land, who will gain strength and courage from a knowledge of the struggles and the triumphs of this young man, who rose from the obscurity of poverty and by the force of character and intellect and industry won his way to a commanding position in the Congress of the United States and to an eminence that exerted a powerful influence on the public thought of the age.

His early life was a struggle against adversity. After his graduation from the University of West Virginia, at the age of 17, he came west and applied for one of the rural schools in Dekalb County, Ill. While waiting the decision of the school board he occupied his time working on a farm, and it is related that when the board sought him to discuss his employment as teacher they found him at work digging potatoes, barefooted and clad in a pair of overalls. During the two years of his career as a teacher his spare moments were employed in reading law, and in 1878 the future Senator and his older brother decided to locate at Fort Dodge, Iowa, and open a law office.

Clients were few and far between, and the law firm led a precarious existence. I recall a vivid description of their early struggles by the Senator himself. "After we had given the landlady our last cent," he said, "we removed our personal belongings to the law office, where we slept on the floor and did our own cooking." By and by his brother gave up the fight and returned to the old home in West Virginia to enter the ministry. Then, to quote the Senator's own words:

I was left alone. I had no money. Once I worked on the public road for $1.50 a day. But I kept cheerful, and in the evenings I would go down to the drug store and talk politics. Unexpectedly I was nominated and elected corporation counsel at a salary of $200 a year. Right there I ceased to be an intermittent day laborer on the streets, and thereafter Fort Dodge knew me only as a lawyer.

At the age of 26 he leaped into political prominence by a speech as temporary chairman of the Republican State convention of Iowa, held in the spring of 1884. That speech attracted national attention, and as a result of it he bore a conspicuous part in the memorable presidential campaign of that year, traveling for a time and speaking with James G. Blaine. Four years later, in 1888, he was chosen to represent the tenth congressional district of Iowa in this House, and for more than 10 years he was a Member of this body. When the Dingley tariff was enacted Mr. DOLLIVER was a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and distinguished himself in the work of framing and passing that law.

On the death of Senator John H. Gear, Mr. DOLLIVER was promoted from the House to the Senate. He filled a conspicuous rôle in the railroad-rate legislation of the last administration, the Hepburn-Dolliver law being to a large extent the product of his labors. But it was during the tariff debate in the present Congress that he achieved his greatest fame. In that memorable debate he showed a mastery of his subject, a skill in its presentation, and a command of logic and argument which stamped his speeches as the most powerful that were made during that memorable contest.

Few men in all the history of the United States Senate have equaled Senator DOLLIVER for eloquence and force of speech. He possessed the gift of eloquence to an exceptional degree, and was equally effective on the popular platform and in the more exacting requirements of senatorial debate. His oratory was scholarly and philosophic, and with an imposing presence, a full, deep voice, a profuse and scintillating vocabulary, and a never-failing supply of wit and humor, he had the happy faculty of winning the rapt attention of every person within the sound of his voice.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to add an analytical appreciation of his oratorical power from the pen of his life-long friend and neighbor, Hon. George E. Roberts:

In him were combined in rare degree all the qualifications of a political orator. There have been other popular campaigners in Iowa during his time, each with his own effective characteristics, but J. P. DOLLIVER was in a class by himself. Neither on the stump nor in Congress was there anyone who combined the scholar, the statesman, and the orator as they were combined in him.

In the first place, he had the philosophic, reflective mind that views every subject in the large way and seizes intuitively upon fundamentals. His grasp of principles was sure. He was thoroughly educated and informed, his reading and culture were so broad that he was always abreast of the best thought of the time. His campaigns over the tenth district were an educational influence upon this people. He pitched every discussion upon a high plane. His style was distinctly his own, simple and homely in a way, but wonderfully effective in statement, and combining with this the grace and finish and pathos of the accomplished orator. His literary sense was true and his judgment of material unerring. There was no straining for effect. He had the imagination that is the soul of great oratory—the imagination of the seer, the poet, and the statesman. He was logical, but much more than logical, his mental processes outran the methods of logic and summed up the argument in a sentence. He thought in pictures and epigrams. His wit was illuminating, but humorous rather than biting. He could use sarcasm with terrible effect, but was not malicious enough to delight in it. In his earlier years he used it freely in a good-humored way at the expense of his political adversaries, but outgrew that in his maturity and treated everybody with the respect that he really felt for sincere opinions. He seldom told a story or read an extract, preferring as well he might, to make his points in his own language. There was nothing approaching coarseness or vulgarity in his speeches, but always the charm of clear, apt, and vigorous statement couched in the most felicitous phrase. He could take a commonplace or abstruse subject and before either the academy of political science or a country schoolhouse audience invest it with vital interest. He knew the people of this country with sympathetic familiarity from the highest to the lowliest, was in touch with every class, at home with all, understood them all and knew the way to their hearts.

His mind was fertile, active, imaginative, and his gift of language was extraordinary; but after all is said, the capacity for hard work had more to do with his success than is commonly understood. His broad culture was not obtained without effort. He was an omnivorous reader; he was a most industrious student of every subject which he undertook to discuss. He came to Iowa when the greenback issue was uppermost, and he read the literature of the question completely, including the congressional debates when the greenbacks were issued. He had the same knowledge of the silver question, and his masterly treatment of that subject in the tenth district showed the same capacity for thorough analysis and convincing argument that was revealed to the Senate in the tariff debate.

In striking contrast to most men possessed of his extraordinary qualifications, Senator DOLLIVER did not naturally crave the distinction and honors of leadership. He lacked the egotism of most political leaders. He was singularly free from any trace of conceit. None of his intimate friends ever saw an expression of it. He never lost his modest poise or was without his sense of humor for a moment. He was therefore nothing of the political boss. He was supreme in the tenth district by his own preeminence, not by the power of a machine. He had no taste for machine politics, no disposition to call upon his friends to do political service. Among politicians this was counted a weakness, as he was said to lack trading strength. It is true that he was never strong in the arts of manipulation. His strength was in his superb powers as an advocate upon the issues, and there he was almost without an equal in any forum.

But, with all the admiration which his talents and ability commanded, DOLLIVER the man was even greater than DOLLIVER the orator and statesman. He had a charming personality, and to know him was to be his friend. He had a heart as big as his great body and an unfailing geniality which made friends rapidly and retained them easily.

His life was the exemplification of the words of George Linnæus Banks:

I live for those who love me,
For those who know me true,
For the heaven that smiles above me
And awaits my spirit too;
For the wrongs that need resistance,
For the cause that needs assistance,
For the future in the distance,
And the good that I can do.

Senator DOLLIVER was an optimist, full of kindliness and rare good humor. He was generous by nature, obliging in disposition, and possessed a heart filled with human sympathy.

He had a warm spot in his heart for the rising generation, and among his greatest delights was to be helpful to the youth of the land. In the impressive funeral services at Fort Dodge last October there was no sentiment uttered that rang truer than the one offered by Mr. Harvey Ingham when he said that "Senator DOLLIVER left the door a little wider open for the common boy and girl."

It can be truthfully said that Senator DOLLIVER gave his life to the service of his country as truly as ever did any soldier on the field of battle. The days and nights of toil which he put in during the special and regular sessions of the present Congress overtaxed his strength, and when he left Washington last summer he was broken in health. During the special session it was not unusual for him to be found zealously studying the intricacies of tariff schedules far into the night, in preparation for his great fight on certain rates in the Payne bill.

He had forged to the front with a display of unusual powers, which not only established him in a position of great power in the Senate of the United States, but had lifted him to that more select class who actually leave a lasting impress upon the life and thought of their day and generation. That tariff debate in the summer of 1909 revealed Senator DOLLIVER as the most powerful debater in that body, and as a man who possessed the moral courage to break with his party before he would with his conscience.

Under these most extraordinary circumstances the sorrow of the people is intensified by the thought that he laid down his life in a zealous effort to protect their rights, and just at the time when he was entering that period of his life which promised the greatest usefulness and power.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to add a few brief tributes from some of the leading public men of our State and country to the memory of our departed friend, whose memory we honor this day by these services:

Gov. B. F. Carroll:

Of all the able men that our State has given to public service few have arisen to that mark of distinction attained by Senator DOLLIVER, especially as an exponent of public questions. His friends extend beyond the limits of our Nation, and his splendid ability and patriotic devotion to public duty are recognized by all who knew him. Our State will deeply mourn the loss of this brilliant and able statesman and public servant. His career as a public official, covering near a quarter of a century, was full of events, and his promise of useful service to his State and Nation was full of hopeful fruition. In his death both the State and the Nation sustain a great loss, and his memory will long be cherished by a loyal and patriotic people.

Hon. S. F. Prouty:

I had learned to regard Senator DOLLIVER as one of the greatest benefactors of the masses of the people, and as one of the greatest men of the West, if not of the entire country. He had a peculiar power of expression that was particularly effective, and he used this power in the cause of the masses of the people.

Hon. H. M. Towner:

Regardless of factional or, indeed, of party alignment Iowa will mourn the loss of her brilliant and distinguished Senator. He was so distinctly an Iowan that his loss is personal and intimate to our people, but the Nation has lost from its great forum its greatest orator and most able debater. There will be universal sorrow at his death.

Hon. W. W. Morrow:

When the political history of this country is written, the name of JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER will be inscribed in glowing phrases as one of the greatest orators and ablest leaders of the age. He was a great man, a grand man, and one we all respected.

Hon. J. L. Bleakley:

His long and faithful service for the State, his untiring energy, and his patriotic zeal in behalf of his country will be written on the undying pages of history.

Hon. George D. Perkins:

Senator DOLLIVER was of buoyant disposition. He had experience with the shadows, but it was his delight to be in the play of gentle atmosphere, warmed by the sun. He was a noble son, husband, father, brother. He counted not as sacrifice whatever measure of service he could render for those he loved. In all his relations he was a genial, likable man. Bitterness was not born with him, nor could it find root in the generosity of his disposition. He had the strength for heavy blows, but the tenderness of his heart made quick burial of enmities.

Col. Theodore Roosevelt:

Senator DOLLIVER'S death is a great misfortune to the country, especially at this time. He was a public man whose character, ability, and loyalty to the interests of the people I especially admired.

Hon. C. W. Fairbanks:

Senator DOLLIVER was one of the best men the country has ever produced, a friend whom we all admired and loved.

Col. Henry Watterson:

Whom the gods love die young. Senator DOLLIVER had at least the good fortune that comes to those whose ship goes down "when eager winds are kissing every sail." He was spared the shipwreck of hope that is suffered by hard-working public servants who realize in their old age that improving human institutions is a form of activity that promises greater labor than reward.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, a great man has fallen at the meridian of his greatness, and the Nation mourns his loss with a universal sorrow. DOLLIVER was a young man when death came, and there seemed to have been every promise that his greatest achievements were still before him. And yet 22 years of his life was spent in the Congress of the United States, a much longer period than the average service of statesmen and other men of public affairs. Besides, life is not measured by length of days, but by human heart throbs, transcendent purposes, and noble deeds. Measured by these standards, his was a long life and his career was well rounded and mature.

JONATHAN DOLLIVER was a child of genius. His oratorical powers were as truly a gift of Nature as the genius of the sculptor, the painter, or the poet. Rhetoric is an accomplishment of the schools. Oratory may be enriched and embellished by cultivation and by the deep experiences of human life; but the orator is born, not made. The ability to hold and sway audiences as under a spell of magnetism, the ability to blunt a logical deduction by a word or the wave of a hand, or to destroy a sophistry with a single epigram—these are rare powers, possessed by but few men, who bear the unmistakable stamp of genius. DOLLIVER sprang into national prominence in a single great speech in the Republican State convention of Iowa in 1884. He became at once a national character. He was in great demand on political and popular platforms everywhere. His name would insure a crowd in any part of the country. He never lost the ability to maintain the reputation that his first great speech had given him. The most masterful utterances of his whole career were his last two or three great speeches in the Senate. They marshal the fundamental principles of popular government with eloquence seldom equaled in legislative debate, and they define the field and scope as well as the limitations of political parties with such clearness of view and such convincing logic as to make them classics in political literature.

At the time of his death Senator DOLLIVER was the strongest individual force in the movement now shaping toward the popularization of the United States Senate.

He liked the democratic quality of the House of Representatives. He had just gone to the Senate when I came to the House in 1901. He came back frequently to watch debate in this body. He missed the free forum in which he had served so long, and had not yet adapted himself to the more dignified procedure of the Senate. He liked legislation by conflict and had not acquired the habit of legislation by courtesy. He gloried in the blunt truthfulness of a forum of debate in which an uninteresting speech is made to empty seats, but where the man with a message soon fills the chairs and, as interest becomes intense, Members gather closely around the orator like the folds of a garment.

"MARTIN," he said to me one day, "the House of Representatives is the most democratic legislative body in the world. Here a man sinks or swims, according to his talents."

Later he mastered the legislative procedure of the Senate, and his great powers were never in better form than when balanced by the limitations of senatorial debate. And yet he was always, in the broadest sense, a representative of the people. He viewed all legislation in its bearing upon the general welfare. Instinctively he saw the line of separation between the encroachments of special interests and the well-being of all the people. Instantly his militant armor was on, and he was in the arena in the midst of the battle for popular rights. He was never a demagogue, but always a knight of the common good.

DOLLIVER was a profound student of the principles of our Government. He was rooted and grounded in the fundamental principles of human rights and relations. And he was never lost in the task which a statesman always has before him of applying the fundamental principles to the varying problems of the hour. No man of our generation could set forth these essential principles in more attractive form or with more telling effect.

DOLLIVER's humor was constant and sparkling, like a clear stream of water gurgling from a spring. His wit was a burnished saber of offense and defense. His satire cut clean as a lance, but was never dipped in poison. His fun was never more appreciated than when the joke was on himself. I heard him say that he was once forced into a candidacy for the Vice Presidency of the United States through the friendly intentions of Col. West, then of the Washington Post, but that he got out by "unanimous consent." How delicious was his remark in the tariff debate that the two noteworthy events of the year 1909 were the revision of the tariff downward by the Senator from Rhode Island and the discovery of the North Pole by Dr. Cook. No man ever excelled him in the use of epigrammatic speech. More than once has he slain a humbug with a humorous epigram. I want a copy of the volumes that must be published of DOLLIVER's public addresses, beginning with his speech before the Iowa convention in 1884. When these volumes are published I believe they will present the most readable and illuminating history obtainable of the political development of the past quarter of a century.

One of the marvels of DOLLIVER's talents was his mastery over the details of great questions. Great orators are often generalizers and neglectful of details. Not so with DOLLIVER. I have heard men express the opinion that DOLLIVER was not a close student of the intricate details of public questions. With that view I disagree absolutely. There is no single question more difficult and laborious in its mastery than the tariff question. Yet there are few, if any, men with a better understanding of that problem than had Senator DOLLIVER. He began his study of those intricate problems with Dingley and McKinley in the House, and his laborious methods carried him over every phase of every schedule and into the consideration of the effect of tariff rates upon all American industries and upon the general progress of all the people.

No man mastered the subject with a more statesmanlike grasp, and no man was a safer adviser on tariff questions. Had DOLLIVER been chairman of the Committee on Finance, or even a member of that committee, as by all the precedents he ought to have been, some recent tariff history would have been differently written, and the Republican Party, in whose policies he so implicitly believed, would have been saved some of the embarrassments which have since fallen to its lot.

Over all JONATHAN DOLLIVER's character as a man towers monument-like, the most striking quality in his unusual career. His sturdy parents endowed him richly in mind and heart and rugged manhood, but in no quality was he more generously favored than in his deep, abiding religious faith. With unerring certainty he discovered the moral quality in every great public controversy. He came to the defense of a good cause with all the force of his nature, and he could unmask a sham or pretense with a completeness that would render further deception impossible.

An acute moral sense is the best political asset that a public man can possess. It will help him to detect the right of a public dispute when the processes of reason and logic are slow and unreliable. That he followed implicitly his convictions of the right in every situation must have been apparent to every close observer. Among the many evidences of this is this passage from one of the latest of his speeches in the Senate:

> In the course which I have pursued in the Senate I have always endeavored to find out, if I could, the path appearing to lead in the direction of the common welfare. I have never been able to know, as questions arose, whether or not the course I had chosen led in the direction of my personal political fortune. In fact, I have had absolutely no motive for caring whether it did or not.

Senator DOLLIVER's home relations afford us a view of the most beautiful picture of his life. His wife was to him a most trusted counselor and companion. His children were the most sacred of his earthly blessings. From such a haven of inspiration he went forth daily to battle for the highest ideals and to bear a manly part in the worthy struggle to bring the greatest good to all men.

In the closing hours of a busy Congress no one can do full justice to the memory of this remarkable man. As one of his intimate and admiring friends, I can do no less than to offer this modest tribute of appreciation of one of the kindliest and most gifted men our country has ever known.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, this occasion has its lesson, this day its sadness. The lesson is found in the life of a great and good man; the sadness in his untimely death. We glory in the achievements of JONATHAN PRENTISS DOLLIVER; in his death we mourn a Nation's irreparable loss.

It is not given to the mind of man to prescribe a formula for greatness. The component elements of the human mind, their relations to each other, and their harmonious blending in the human compound of greatness must forever remain one of the secrets of this life. Dark and mysterious as are the questions upon which the solution of this problem depends, yet we see in the life of every man characteristics that make for him his place in the world, be that place great or small.

Senator DOLLIVER inherited the strong religious tendencies of his father. He had a childlike faith in a Supreme and Overruling Providence. He loved the Bible, and his public address and private conversation reflected a deep study of it and an unwavering belief in its precepts. To his simple faith and trust in a God whose name is Love was due his great optimism, his buoyancy of spirit and his cheerful disposition.

The human side of Senator DOLLIVER was most strongly developed, and to this fact more than any other is due his greatness. A feeling for others was a predominating characteristic in his life. To help make his country a better abiding place for his fellow man was his ambition and his aim. Unmindful of his own welfare, he drew all too freely upon his great strength in working for the good of others. Altruistic himself, he despised all forms of selfishness in others. In him—

Love took up the harp of Life, and smote on all the chords with might;
Smote the chord of Self, that, trembling, passed in music out of sight.

As a legislator he was alert to discover the plans of the designing and the selfish. He frequently expressed his abhorrence of lobbyists by applying to them the term of "dirty workers." His ear was always open to the story of stunted children, toil-worn shop girls, and starving miners. His time and his strength were always at their command that he might make their road easier and their burden lighter. He gave all too freely of his wonderful intellect, his almost limitless strength, and his big heart to secure the enactment of such laws as would give every man a more even chance with every other man. If measured as the world measures greatness, others have surpassed him, but if measured by heart throbs for his fellow man, few have equaled him.

In the humanity of DOLLIVER was found his true greatness. He rose rapidly from the position of a country lawyer to that of a Senator of the United States. Of the 52 years of his life 21 years were spent in Congress. From the time of his entrance in this House until his death he was recognized as one of the greatest political orators, not only of his day, but of all time. His rise was as rapid as his place was permanent.

Twice DOLLIVER could have been the nominee of his party for the exalted position of Vice President of the United States. And twice he refused to permit his name to go before the nominating convention. Honors came to him in rapid succession, but none of them nor all of them combined were able to swerve him from his devotion to the service of the common citizen. All the honors which he achieved and the distinctions which came to him only drew him closer to those whose cause he had long championed. They served to strengthen the bond of sympathy between him and the common man.

Senator DOLLIVER'S life was a complete answer to Kipling's test:

If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue,
Or walk with kings—nor lose the common touch.

He did more than this. Neither his recognition as an orator nor his elevation to high political positions caused him to lose his sympathy for or his interest in the common people. These achievements only strengthened the bond of brotherhood between himself and his fellow man. He looked out upon the life we live and saw that the greater half of life's misery came not from frost or drought, fire or flood, pestilence or famine, disease or death, but from the selfishness of men, from the want of brotherhood, the lack of fellowship. In the millions of loveless homes, in the bickering of employer and employee, in the flaunting insolence of newly won riches and ill-gotten gain, in the bickerings of trade, and the crimes of the calendar, in laws which were violated, in hopes which were blasted, and in hearts that were broken—in all these he saw witness to the greed and selfishness of man. His great humanity directed the field for his statesmanship, the forum for his oratory, and the secret of his great success.

Gentleness and kindness were visible expressions of his great humanity. He was as gentle as a child and as tender as a woman. The hurt of a friend plunged him in sorrow, the joy of an associate bathed him in sunbeams.

This dominant characteristic in the life of Senator DOLLIVER also found expression in his great love of nature. He loved the rugged oak and the spreading elm; the squirrels and the birds were his companions and friends as he strolled in the woodland. He loved his farm, and on so many occasions expressed the wish that he might retire there and spend the rest of his days free from factional and political strife.

The quiet and unselfish life in which the farm abounds appealed most strongly to his nature. He loved its simple life, the genuineness of its people, the changes of the seasons and the homely farm scene; the spring with its freshness and its fragrance; the summer with its fields of growing grain waving in the sunlight; the autumn with the hum of the reaper and the song of the meadow lark; the winter with its snowbound prairies stretching far in the distance; these he loved and in his meditation of them he found his recreation.

The day we buried DOLLIVER was cold and cloudy; a drizzling rain had set in and gloom had cast its shadow over the inhabitants of the city of Fort Dodge. I shall long remember the sorrow and tender sympathy exhibited on the streets as the funeral procession passed from the armory to the cemetery. Thousands of men, women, and children lined the sides of the street, unmindful of the cold and drizzling rain. Sorrow was written deeply on every countenance. Thousands of tear-stained faces told the story all too plainly of broken hearts. Thus unconsciously his neighbors and friends paid the highest tribute to his memory. The city of Fort Dodge is erecting a bronze statue to the memory of Senator DOLLIVER, but in the minds and hearts of the people of this generation are enshrined memories of him that are more enduring than marble, more lasting than bronze. He made for himself a big place in the world and he filled that place like the great man that he was.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, one of the pleasant features of serving in this House is that a majority of the Members do not permit the big aisle which separates the House into two parties to be regarded as a line of demarkation in matters of friendship. Senator JONATHAN PRENTISS DOLLIVER was one of my most intimate friends. In fact, he was one of the three most intimate of all the Republicans with whom I have served in 16 years. Circumstances determine very largely questions of personal intimacy. The way that Senator DOLLIVER and I became so intimate was that I was poor and he did not have very much money himself, so both of us had been experimenting somewhat in the business of lecturing at what are called lyceum lectures, and also at the Chautauquas, and were making some headway and some money. In the fall of 1899 it occurred to me one day that I had heard in years gone by that the Brockway Lecture Bureau at Pittsburg, which arranged the dates for both Senator DOLLIVER and myself, had a few years before conducted a joint lecture between the Hon. Michael Harter, of Ohio, and the Hon. Roswell G. Horr, of Michigan, on the tariff question. The difference between a lecture and a speech is that you get pay for a lecture and you do not get any pay for a speech. I wrote to them and asked them if that dual lecture or debating performance had been a success, and they answered that it had. Then I wrote to them that it seemed to me that the signs of the times indicated that politics would be of considerable interest in the next 12 months, and why not arrange a debate on the Chautauqua circuit and at these lectures courses for myself and some Republican. They answered by telling me to pick my own Republican. So I suggested Senator DOLLIVER, and we went into it.

Our first debate was down at Chambersburg, Pa., on the 14th day of December, 1899, the one hundredth anniversary of the death of George Washington. We proceeded in that business with a great deal of success, if drawing large crowds is a test of merit, until he was appointed to the Senate, and I think during that time that he and I must have had somewhere in the neighborhood of 50 or 75 debates. The very day that he was appointed to the United States Senate we had a debate down in southern Iowa. It was my turn to open and close, but he asked me as a special favor to let him open and deliver the whole of his hour and a quarter speech first, so that he could catch a train to Des Moines to see Gov. Shaw about being appointed Senator. I always told him that I thumped him into the United States Senate. His reply to that was to inquire why I did not thump myself into the United States Senate.

The other two men with whom I have debated at these lecture courses and Chautauquas are Gen. Grosvenor, of Ohio, and the Hon. C. B. Landis, of Indiana, and, notwithstanding radical differences of political opinions, they are among my closest friends.

Debating on the circuit brings men into very close relationship. The newspaper wits have a way of undertaking to make the Chautauqua lecturers the butt of their jokes. There is, however, this much to be said about lecture money. It is clean money; you do not have to explain where you got it, or how you got it, or when you got it. In addition to that, the lecture business, which flourished very much from about 1855 to 1865 and then died out almost entirely, taking a new start with these Chautauquas, has been a great educational force in the country, and the Chautauqua business especially has been of vast influence in that regard. Some of the most distinguished men in both Houses of Congress have tried their hands at it, with varying degrees of success.

I was a guest in Senator DOLLIVER'S house. I enjoyed the hearty hospitality of himself and wife. I roamed with him over his fine farm up on the bluffs, consisting of 400 or 500 acres of as rich land as the sun ever shone on. He took a great deal of pride in the fact that the farm had at one time belonged to Gov. Carpenter. He was genial; he was companionable; he was handsome; he was true as steel to his friends.

It may or may not be known to some people that he came very near being President of the United States. There has been a great deal of dispute about what happened down at Philadelphia in 1900 at that Republican convention. Of course, I do not undertake to say exactly what did happen or all that happened. I will tell what I believe, and I believe it on the very best authority, too, and that is if Col. Roosevelt had adhered to his declared intention of not accepting the vice-presidential nomination, without doubt JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER would have been nominated almost by acclamation. Of course if he had been he would have been elected along with McKinley and would have succeeded to the Presidency of the United States. That he would have made an intelligent and patriotic President I have no doubt.

When he and I were debating at the Chautauquas and in the lecture courses he was a great deal more of an orator than he was a debater. There is a vast difference between an orator and a debater. A man may be both, but he is lucky if he is either. I think in the hour and a quarter's speech that he delivered in those debates there were two or three sections of 10 minutes each which would have graced the speech books, which is the highest tribute I know how to pay to his eloquence. He lived, however, to become one of the foremost debaters in the land, and strange to say, he became a debater in the last year or two of his life.

I am not going to trench upon the dangerous ground of political differences in this talk, except so far as it may be necessary to illumine his life. My own judgment about it is that, considered solely with relation to DOLLIVER's fame as a debater and thinker, the best thing that ever happened to him was that Senator ALDRICH and the men who made up the Finance Committee of the Senate refused to place him on it. That put him on his mettle. He was determined to show the men who did that that he knew something about the tariff question and could debate with the best of them. He employed an expert on tariff facts, paying him out of his own pocket, and the expert rendered him very valuable services, and I believe it is entirely within the range of truth to say that DOLLIVER's speeches in the Senate in the last 18 months of his life are among the finest specimens of congressional debating that have taken place in the last 20 years.

I have said time and again—I have said it in this House; I have said it on the stump; I have said it in private conversation—that the last speech, the long speech which Senator DOLLIVER delivered on that tariff bill 10 months after it was passed, in the spring of 1910, as a sample of oratory, of eloquence, of wit, of humor, of sarcasm, of learning, has not been exceeded in either branch of Congress in a generation. There are parts of it equal in irony to anything that Junius wrote. There are bits of it equal in wit to anything that Sydney Smith ever said. There are certain parts and passages of it equal in humor to Mark Twain at his best. There are certain parts of it as philosophical as Lord Bacon's essays, and taken altogether it is a splendid monument to the man's memory.

I had a rather curious experience with him about it. When I made the 1 hour and 20 minutes' speech here in May, 1910, in reply to Mr. Chairman PAYNE, I quoted from that speech of Senator DOLLIVER's very liberally. A few days afterwards I was over in the Senate, and I told him that he was an ungrateful kind of a statesman. He wanted to know why. I replied that I had quoted his speech very elaborately in the House, and that it seemed to me he ought to thank me for it; that it gave him a great advertisement, and that he never had thanked me for it. He looked at me in a quizzical sort of way and said that he was not absolutely certain that the fact that I had quoted from his speeches and had passed eulogies upon his present views would be of any advantage to him ultimately in a political way.

In that same conversation he startled me by telling me that he was in a very bad condition, physically; that he was extremely anxious and uneasy about himself.

Senator DOLLIVER was an enthusiast by nature. He was a Methodist, thoroughly imbued with the principles of the Christian religion as expounded by the Methodists. In politics he was a thoroughgoing Republican, born and reared in a Republican household, a Republican all his days. He was a patriot to the core. I never knew a man who loved his country with greater devotion than he did. He seemed destined for a long life. He cut a splendid figure in this House. He cut a splendid figure in the Senate. It does not necessarily follow, and in a great many cases it does not follow, that because a man is a shining light in the House he is sure to succeed equally well in the Senate. But he succeeded equally well in both. He was stricken down in the very prime of life, at the meridian of his fame. He now takes his place in the goodly company of distinguished men whom Iowa has contributed to the service, the honor, and the glory of the Republic.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, in accord with time-honored custom we are here to-day to speak in memory of the life, character, and work of one of Iowa's most beloved and distinguished citizens, one who for 20 years was a beloved and honored Member of this House and Senate; one endowed with lofty ideals; a character of the highest type, founded on integrity; one with unusual talent, fortified with a wealth of learning. He as a young man entered the public service with zeal, integrity, character, ability, and conscience, rectitude of purpose, dominated by noble and lofty ideals, with firm determination to do justice and right, to serve his country and fellow men.

Having served with Senator DOLLIVER in this House, having lived in his home, and having studied his grand life and character, I got to know him well, and the better I knew him the more I admired him and the more I loved him. I knew of his bright life, his pure character, his devotion to truth, his many grand and noble qualities manifested in his every walk of life, both public and private. In his Christian home he lived a pure, bright, and grand life, a most devoted husband and a patient and affectionate father, generous, considerate, and helpful to others, always ready to lend a helping hand, a man with keen, clean, clear, and sound mind, blessed with extraordinary intelligence and power of conception, a student, a thinker, and a most untiring worker. There seemed to be no limit and no end to his industry and research. In his home, in his office, in the Senate chamber, from early morning to late at night he toiled. Among the most pleasant hours of my life are those spent in his company. Nearly every night, after his day's work, he would join the circle around the fireplace to cheer, to enlighten, and entertain. He possessed a wonderful fund of knowledge and wide range of information not only on public questions, but he spoke with readiness and fluency on any subject he took up and discussed. His remarks on any subject were not only illuminating and brilliant but always instructive and interesting in the highest degree. Every thought and utterance was fresh and refreshing. We all found in him something to learn. Uppermost in his mind and his heart was his God, the people, and country he so dearly loved. Every act and purpose was patriotic. He was eminently a talented and lovable man. In his modest, unassuming way, his kindness and strong mind and character, his sympathy and unceasing industry he fought his way up in the world and attained the high and exalted position which he occupied at the time of his death.

At the age of 31, in 1888, he was elected, and in 1889 he became a Member of Congress, and August 2, 1900, with 11 years of distinguished and faithful service to his country, here in the House, he was appointed United States Senator, and twice elected by the legislature of his State.

No man ever entered public life better fortified and equipped as a legislator. His work, especially in the last years of his service, showed that it meant little to him whether many or few shared in his views. If he felt that he was right, that was all sufficient to him. That was his guiding star and when fully convinced that he was right, he would go straight forward with a courage that never faltered and with earnestness, sincerity, and clearness he would point out what to him seemed the right course. He seemed to have knowledge of every proposition before Congress, its scope and object, and whenever any important question arose concerning the welfare of his people and country, he never flinched, shrunk, or forgot his responsibility. He was always found in the foremost ranks, championing the cause of liberty and for what seemed just and right to him, and with his power of speech and eloquence he moved his audience to tears and applause, with his mine of knowledge, his power of comprehension, his forceful and logical presentation of facts he always received the closest attention and his speeches proved most effective. He rarely attempted to speak without preparation. Generally his speeches were prepared with the greatest of care, and the ideas, style, thought, and arrangement of his speeches were the result of his skill and hard work. But fortified as he was with a wealth of learning and knowledge of public affairs, acquired by experience and constant and persistent study, without previous preparations, he would, at times, speak for hours with fluency, mastering the subject discussed with force, clearness, and eloquence, and in these master efforts it seems that all that was necessary for him to do was to reach out into that ocean of eloquence and information he had stored away, to pick out one gem after the other, and for hours he would deal out sledgehammer blows with a most powerful and unceasing eloquence.

DOLLIVER was not a politician or an organizer. As an orator of his day he had no superior. Iowa has been blessed in orators, statesmen, and public men. Of them all, Senator DOLLIVER achieved the widest and most enduring fame. No man in public life rendered to the Republic more patriotic, faithful, and eminent service than did Senator DOLLIVER.

When we review his career for zeal, faithfulness, his noble and upright life; what he did and sought to do for the good of humanity and his country; his conception of the high purpose of Government; truly it can be said that he was an honor to his State and to the House and Senate.

Senator DOLLIVER commanded, not only public confidence, but the love, respect, and affection of all who knew him. The depth of feeling of his neighbors and friends was manifested in the large concourse of people at his funeral. We saw the large auditorium and streets filled with men and women, old and young, black and white, from near and far, assembled there in testimony of their deep affection and to do honor to his memory. Here, where he had lived the greater part of his life and where they knew him best, they loved him most. The presence of thousands of friends and neighbors, the sorrow, the sermon, the eulogies, the flowers, and expressions on every hand testified to his greatness and that a faithful friend and upright citizen had passed away.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in 1884, when but 26 years of age, Senator DOLLIVER by a single address took his place among the great public speakers, not only of Iowa, but of this country. Never, perhaps, was there such a sudden rise to conspicuous prominence by any man in the history of that State. That year he was called to many Eastern States, and his reputation immediately spread throughout the country. In four years he was elected to this House and remained here without opposition until his appointment to the Senate.

I became acquainted with him early in his career, and for many years we were close personal friends. I was early impressed with the wonderful breadth of his reading, and particularly with the extent of his knowledge of English and American literature. This, without any ostentation of learning, enabled him to illumine his conversation and public addresses with all the philosophy and wit of all the ages.

He was the most eloquent man ever produced by Iowa, and I think I am not influenced by any provincial spirit when I say that he was the greatest American public speaker of his time. His spontaneous spirit and wide reading made him a most delightful associate and companion. Brilliant as was his public career, his devotion to his family was his most admirable characteristic. He was a beloved son and brother, a devoted husband and father, and all those nearest and dearest to him are entitled to have the sincere sympathy, not only of the people of Iowa, but of all the people of the United States, because before his sun had reached its high meridian and turning cast shadows toward the east his sky was darkened and his day was done.

THE LATE SENATOR M'ENERY.

Mr. PUJO took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions (H. Res. 998), which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. SAMUEL DOUGLAS MCENERY, late a Member of the United States Senate from the State of Louisiana, which occurred in the city of New Orleans, La., June 28, 1910.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given to pay tribute to his memory.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public service the House, at the conclusion of the memorial exercises of the day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, it is a melancholy pleasure to pay tribute to the memory of Senator MCENERY, for I loved him in life and wish to do all in my power to honor him in death. My first vote was cast in 1884 for SAM MCENERY, as we called him in those days, then a candidate for the exalted office of governor of Louisiana, and I voted for him every time after that his name was presented to the people. He was very popular in north Louisiana, where both of us lived, and why not? Had he not been our wise, fearless leader in rescuing Louisiana from the horrors of reconstruction and negro domination? Had he not been our "levee governor" and the savior of our richest lands from the annual floods of the cruel Mississippi? Had he not been the active promoter and upbuilder of our public-school system? Indeed, was there anything of good for Louisiana in those days, a quarter of a century ago, which was not closely allied with the name of SAM MCENERY?

I doubt if any other citizen of the State was ever so popular, and I am sure that no one every retained such a strong hold upon the affections of his people to the day of his death as Senator MCENERY.

It was universally admitted during recent years that no matter what he said or how he voted it was all right with the people of Louisiana, and no man in the State would have dreamed of opposing him for the Senate. Such continued popularity can be accounted for only by the fact that the Senator was a most remarkable man; liberally endowed in mind and heart; unselfish and generous to a fault; never forgetting a friend and bearing no undue malice to foes; wise in plan and bold in execution; a good governor, alive to every interest of his State; a great justice of our supreme court; a United States Senator for everyone, and as solicitous for the poorest citizen as for the most influential; a simple, unassuming, modest gentleman, honest and true, who never used his great abilities for an unworthy purpose in all his long life of 73 years, but ever devoted them to promoting the welfare of Louisiana.

SAMUEL DOUGLAS MCENERY was born at Monroe, La., May 28, 1837, and died in New Orleans June 28, 1910. His parents were Henry O'Neil McEnery, a native of Ireland, and Caroline H. (Douglas) McEnery, of Virginia. His early education was at the Jesuit College, Springhill, Ala.; then for three years as a midshipman at Annapolis, from May 25, 1852, to June 23, 1855, when he resigned; and later at the University of Virginia. He studied law at the State and National Law School, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and after being admitted to the bar practiced for one year at Marysville, Mo. Returning to Louisiana shortly before the Civil War, he enlisted in the Confederate Army and served as a lieutenant of the Pelican Grays, Second Louisiana Regiment, under Gen. Magruder, in Virginia, and also in the trans-Mississippi department.

Senator MCENERY'S first prominence in public life was as a leader of the Democrats in Ouachita Parish during the darkest days of reconstruction, when he displayed such able qualities as an organizer against the corruption and misrule of carpetbagism, with its attendant racial horrors, that he soon became recognized as the foremost citizen of north Louisiana. In the State Democratic convention of 1879 he was nominated for lieutenant governor, as running mate to Louis A. Wiltz, candidate for governor. They were elected, and on the death of Gov. Wiltz, in October, 1881, MCENERY became governor.

So successful was his administration that he was nominated and reelected in 1884 for a term of four years. In 1888 he was again a candidate, but was defeated by that grand old hero of the lost cause, Gen. Francis T. Nicholls, who had been governor prior to the selection of Wiltz. In such high esteem was MCENERY held by his successful opponent that he was immediately appointed by him a justice of the supreme court of the State. I recollect well the criticism of many lawyers at the time, who said that while he was an able man and had made a good governor he was not sufficiently versed in the law to make a good judge. Their opinions changed, however, for within one year MCENERY was regarded as one of the ablest jurists in the State, his decisions being noted for brevity, clearness, and correct analysis. The admirers of Judge MCENERY insisted upon his again running for governor in the antilottery campaign of 1892, and after a vigorous fight he was defeated by MURPHY J. FOSTER, later his colleague and intimate friend in the Senate. This campaign did not take MCENERY from the supreme bench, and in 1896, after Gov. FOSTER had been reelected in a hard-fought struggle, MCENERY'S former foes in the Democratic Party implored him to leave the shades of judicial life and again enter the political arena in opposition to Walter D. Denegre, who was supported for the United States Senate by Republicans, the Citizens' League, Populists, and all foes of the State administration. It was a trying hour for the party, and no man in the State could save it except MCENERY. He responded to the call then, as he had ever done, and was elected to the Senate by a slender majority. So well pleased were the people of Louisiana with his stewardship in this great office that they reelected him in 1902 and again in 1908.

From the day of Senator MCENERY'S election as lieutenant governor, in the fall of 1879, to his death, June 28, 1910, over a period of more than 30 years, he continuously held the highest offices in the gift of the people of Louisiana with the greatest credit to himself and honor and profit to his State. Few men have such a record as that.

Senator MCENERY was married June 27, 1878, to Miss Elizabeth Phillips, daughter of Charles Phillips, a prominent planter of Ouachita Parish. His home life was happy, four children being born of the union, three of whom survive him—Charles P. McEnery, an insurance man of New Orleans; Dr. Douglas W.

McEnery, who was his father's secretary for some years; and Mrs. Warren B. Parks.

While Senator McENERY is well remembered and loved for many measures of his administrations as governor, the one which gave him the most fame and was of greatest benefit to Louisiana was his splendid service in rescuing the lowlands of the State from the floods of the Mississippi. He became known as the "levee governor," and when one considers that nearly half the area and more than two-thirds of the wealth of Louisiana is guarded by levees from overflow, it will be seen how complimentary was such a title and in what high esteem it would be held by its possessor. I can not better describe his work in connection with these great public improvements than by quoting from an article that appeared in the Times-Democrat of New Orleans in 1887, entitled "The levee governor:"

Gov. McENERY succeeded to the governorship on the death of Gov. Wiltz, on the 17th of October, 1881. Owing to the fact that the appropriations by the legislature had largely exceeded the revenues, the financial affairs of the State were in such condition that a special session of the general assembly became necessary. Accordingly, Gov. McENERY called it together December 5. In his message to that body thus early in his administration he showed his solicitude toward the levee interests of the State, and insisted that the full amount allowed by the constitution (1 mill) should be appropriated by the legislature for levee purposes, in addition to so much of the swamp-land and drainage fund as was not needed to maintain the office of register of State lands.

This policy in favor of the construction and maintenance of the levees so early inaugurated has been steadily followed to the present time, with what benefits to the State let the record show. Before the policy could be fairly put in operation (levee building for the season being practically at an end, owing to the rise of the river, when Gov. McENERY assumed the gubernatorial chair) the great flood of 1882 came upon the State, causing widespread disaster, and a direct money loss in crops destroyed, stock drowned, farms washed away, and so forth, of not less than $15,000,000, thus abundantly justifying the governor's position that every available dollar that the State could raise for the purpose should be devoted to building and strengthening the levees. The governor was prompt to come to the relief of the sufferers by the flood, and although there was no relief fund available, he did not hesitate to contract obligations for food and other relief for the unfortunates. His action met the universal approval of the people, and was promptly ratified by the legislature when the body met in May.

The flood had not entirely passed from the State, leaving widespread desolation and ruin in its track, when the legislature assembled. In his message the governor again strongly urged the necessities of the levees, and insisted that it was the duty of the General Government to come to the assistance of the State in the matter, holding that it was a case in which favorable action on the part of Congress was not only justified, but imperative.

However, Gov. McENERY did not wait for Federal aid. He recognized that the surest help was self-help, and bent every energy to rebuild the broken levees and put them in order for the high water of 1883. He succeeded measurably, but the flood of 1882 had been so destructive, sweeping away hundreds of miles of levees, that the full accomplishment of the work was impossible with the limited means at command. The flood of 1883 came, and although less disastrous than the one that had preceded it, proved very destructive, and caused those who saw their property again swept away to despair of relief from the invading waters. Gov. McENERY, however, was only nerved to greater efforts to rebuild the levees and avert from the State the disastrous consequences of overflow. He saw that what was to be done must be done quickly in order to take advantage of the levee-building season. He also saw that the funds at command of the State were entirely inadequate to the purpose in view. What was to be done? The legislature would not meet in regular session for a year, and there was a strong popular sentiment against a special session. In this emergency the governor determined to appeal to the people themselves. He therefore issued a call for a convention to meet at Baton Rouge June 18, 1883, and to be composed of delegates selected by the various police juries and the city council of New Orleans. The object of the convention, as announced in the call, was "the maintaining, repairing, and building of levees; the inauguration of a practical system to prevent and close crevasses; the adoption of a plan to prevent the cutting of levees for roadways and the use of them for highways; and in the means to be employed for this improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River."

The convention, famous as the levee convention, met at the time appointed. It was composed of the representative men of the State, its personnel possessing an influence such as has been wielded by the membership of few bodies in the State. The moral support of such a body of men meant the moral support of the entire State, and this support was freely and unhesitatingly tendered the governor in the emergency which had called the convention into life.

* * * * * * *

The convention fully justified the wisdom of the governor in calling it. It infused new confidence in the dwellers on riparian lands, held up Gov. McENERY'S hands in the good work he had set them to do, and unloosened the purse strings of police juries and private individuals to such an extent that the administration was enabled to proceed with energy with what had seemed an almost hopeless task. So vigorously was the work pushed, in fact, that when the annual rise of the river came in 1884 the levees were found in condition to resist the flood and keep in safety the thousands of people and millions of property sheltered behind them.

This was not the only beneficial result that flowed from the levee convention. Following the request of the convention, Gov. McENERY invited the governors of the States of Mississippi, Arkansas, Missouri, Tennessee, and Illinois to the proposed interstate convention at Vicksburg. The invitation was accepted and the convention met. Its deliberations were fruitful of the best results. It brought about unity of action on the part of the States subject to overflow and protected by levees, and a determination to make a united demand upon the Federal authorities for aid in holding the levees and improving the navigation of the Mississippi River.

Thus to Gov. McENERY'S initiative is Louisiana largely indebted, not only for the interest manifested in levee matters in the State itself, but for Federal assistance in the work of maintaining and rebuilding them.

Of the work itself, Gov. McENERY reported as follows to the legislature (message, May 4, 1884):

"Since the report made to the general assembly in April, 1882, 120 contracts for the construction of levees have been made, and nearly all of them have been faithfully executed. The work done under these contracts and the unfinished work under prior contracts not completed in April, 1882, amounts to nearly 130 miles of levee, requiring 3,699,636 cubic yards of earth work at a cost of $887,970. The State during the same period expended for preventing or closing crevasses $35,500, making an aggregate cost of levee work for the period of $923,470.

"The United States Mississippi River Commission in August, 1882, allotted $75,000 to close gaps in levees between the mouth of Red River and Cypress Creek, and $110,000 to close gaps in Pointe Coupee, all for levees in Louisiana except $65,283, which was expended for levee work in Arkansas. The sum of $15,000 was likewise allotted toward building the Bonnet Carre Levee and other allotments were made for the protection of levees during the late flood.

"The levee work in Louisiana by the United States commission nearly equals that done by the State, being mainly above the mouth of Red River, and it has cost the United States Government $839,381.

"The riparian parishes expended on levees since 1881 large sums, reports from 10 parishes alone showing $211,166 of local and individual funds expended. Three railroad companies alone expended $99,450. Thus the total amount expended on levees in Louisiana has been $2,048,000 since 1881."

Notwithstanding the fact that in 1883 some of the riparian parishes were subject to another overflow, owing to the fact that many of the levees that went down before the flood of the preceding year had not been rebuilt or were not sufficiently hardened to withstand the rise of 1883, Gov. McENERY was fully justified by the fact in adding: "In the beginning of March, 1884, the levees of Louisiana were in better condition than they have been at any previous time for more than 20 years." With such energy had the work of rebuilding the levees and repairing the waste created by the waters been prosecuted in the meantime, and so energetically and systematically has the work of levee strengthening and building been continued that the floods since 1883 have been successfully resisted (rare local crevasses excepted), and the people of the riparian parishes have been able to sow and reap behind the dikes erected for their protection in full confidence that they would withstand the pressure of the waters. Lands abandoned for a quarter of a century have again been brought into cultivation, values in riparian parishes have increased, and prosperity is again within reach of the dweller by the banks of the rivers.

I live in East Carroll Parish, one of the worst overflow sections of the State, and was there during the period of Gov. McENERY'S great fight for the levees. I therefore know personally that this account is not overdrawn and does not give him more credit than he really deserves. The fight, so well begun then, has been systematically carried on ever since in splendid cooperation between the several States of the valley and the United States Government. Many millions have been spent; and a great system of levees, continuous, except at the mouths of rivers emptying into the Mississippi, exists from Cairo to the Gulf. And the awful floods which did untold damage during the early eighties now beat frantically but in vain against the splendid levees begun by our "levee governor."

Senator McENERY, while a very close attendant on the sessions of the Senate and scrupulous in his attention to every detail connected with his great office, never neglecting anything, even of the least importance, rarely ever addressed the Senate, and then only after careful preparation, in the choicest of language. His three principal addresses before that august tribunal were as follows:

1. In opposition to the annexation of Hawaii, June 24, 1898, in which this noble sentiment was expressed:

The dignity, character, and strength of nations, as of men, and especially of a republic, depend, in the eyes of the world and of its own people, upon a rigid observance of justice and right, and it should refuse to embrace a policy of aggrandizement, especially where the people to be affected are not consulted.

2. In defense of the suffrage clause of the Louisiana constitution of 1898, delivered January 23, 1900. This speech was a vigorous, able description of the trying times of reconstruction and the desperate attempts of the whites to redeem their States from negro domination and misrule. While he spoke he was interrupted by Senator Butler, of North Carolina, who taunted him on the grandfather clause, and in reply he uttered these eloquent words:

When the constitutional convention was in session I was telegraphed to know what was my opinion of this section 5. I replied to that telegram that, in my opinion, it was unconstitutional. I then received another telegram, after its adoption, to know if, when it was attacked, I would defend it in the Senate of the United States. To that telegram I replied that I would.

I stand, Mr. President, always ready to defend the people of Louisiana when their character is attacked. I stand ready to defend them when their interests are in peril. I stand ready to defend them when their laws are assailed.

It is the same way, Mr. President, in reference to my duty to the Government of the United States in regard to the war that is now being waged in the Philippine Islands. I do not stop to inquire whether the people of the United States are right or wrong. I do not stop to inquire whether or not the first volley was fired by the Filipinos or by the troops of the United States. It is enough for me to know that the authority and power of this Government is assailed and that it is the duty of every citizen, no matter what were his convictions, to rally to the support of the Government, not only to send its ships abroad and its armies upon the field and to supply money and munitions of war, but with our great sympathy and whole will and heart to stand by the President of the United States and uphold his hand until the enemies of this Government are brought under subjection. That same motive, Mr. President, induces me to defend to the best of my ability the constitution of the State of Louisiana when it is assailed.

But, Mr. President, although that was my opinion at that time, I have since studied the question more carefully, and I hope the reasons which I assign are a sufficient justification for that change of opinion.

3. A very elaborate, historical argument on the tariff during the debates on the Payne-Aldrich bill, May 25, 1909, in which he sought to show the interest of the South, especially Louisiana, in the policy of protection and to prove that the early fathers of Democracy were believers in protection. This speech and his vote on the bill, together with his vote on the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897, stamp him as a strong protectionist. He never sailed under false colors, however, in seeking office, but, on the contrary, unequivocally stated to the legislative caucus which elected him Senator in 1896 that be believed in the principle of protection and would carry out his own ideas thereon if elected. His views on the subject never changed, and he was perfectly consistent and honest in trying to enforce them.

The leading characteristics of Senator McENERY were loyalty to his friends and utter unselfishness. He was always willing to accommodate his Louisiana colleagues, and under no circumstances did he ever fail to comply with a promise. No detail was too small for his personal attention. I sometimes thought that he had a special genius for detail, and to that I attribute much of his success. His relations with his brother Senators were most cordial, and everyone of them would do his utmost to accommodate him.

Senator McENERY died full of years and honors, universally loved by all who knew him, and so strong in the affections of his own people as to be above the slightest danger of political rivalry. One of his most beautiful attributes was his kindness to and consideration for the poor. Only a few days ago a laboring man, with the grime of dust on his clothes, visited his home in New Orleans, saying, with tears in his eyes: "I want to see the place where Mr. McENERY was laid out. He was the best friend I ever had." There are hundreds just like this man, for SAMUEL DOUGLAS McENERY was the friend of the poor. What higher tribute could have been paid him than the simple words of this poor laborer?

Mr. Speaker, his fame is safe in that world beyond the skies which knows no change. His memory will live forever in the State and Nation he served so well, and with one accord all who knew him may exclaim:

> His life was gentle, and the elements so mixed in him
> That Nature might stand up and say to all the world:
> "This was a man!"

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, we hold it one of the noblest duties of the living to signalize and perpetuate the virtues and memories of the dead. And in obedience to this sacred sentiment we are assembled here, this beautiful Sabbath day, to pronounce and record our brief tributes of admiration and respect for the character and career of our departed and lamented colleague, the Hon. SAMUEL D. McENERY, late United States Senator from the State of Louisiana; who, in the seventy-fourth year of his age, and on June 28, 1910, "gave his honors to the world again, his blessed part to heaven, and slept in peace."

A brief year ago it was pathetic to observe him amid the scenes that surround us to-day passing to and fro from his duties in the Senate Chamber of this edifice, moving carefully and cautiously as if his powers were failing and he were then tottering slowly down to life's last resting place. And yet, while this was pathetic in one sense, nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, it is a sublime spectacle to see an aged man, with trembling step and his white hair streaming to the breeze, still bravely stemming the rude stream of life as it beats him from side to side, till at last exhausted he folds his arms and sinks beneath the ruthless waters. And so Senator McENERY died as he had lived, in the harness and at the wheel. He fell as it becomes a statesman and a soldier to fall, at the front and in the battle. He did his duty, and he did it well.

Senator McENERY was a native of Louisiana; was an alumnus of Spring Hill College, Ala.; of the University of Virginia, and of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md. He was a graduate of the State and National Law School, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and was engaged in the practice of the legal profession till the stirring times of 1861, when he closed his law books and hurried to the tented field. How well some of us still remember those wild, thrilling days, when the war cry was heard in our land, "To your tents, O Israel, to your tents!" when the drum and the bugle were heard upon almost every hill and in every dale, on every mountain and in every vale, from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, calling the people to arms. Two mighty hostile hosts are now preparing for a conflict that is to convulse the continent and astound the world. A new flag is unfurled on the land, and a new pennant now floats on the sea. In the ensuing crisis our colleague cast his destiny with that of his own people and for four booming and blazing years battled bravely for the cause for which Davis suffered in prison, for which Lee and Forrest fought, and for which Johnston and Jackson died.

Our comrade did not attain high rank as a soldier, being only a first lieutenant at the close of the war. But mere rank, however, offers no adequate measure of one's efficiency as a soldier or of his force and fire as a man. Merit is modest and often unambitious, and many are content to do their duty without the reward of laurels, titles, or decorations. And it is worthy of remark that there were hundreds of soldiers in the southern armies, and I suppose also in the northern armies, during our interstate war of the sixties who were highly educated and professional men but who did not aspire to positions of rank or authority, but who, in the absence of their officers and in sudden emergencies, were often leaders and commanders unto themselves. And this is why the volunteer private soldiers of the American Armies from 1861 to 1865 displayed a higher degree of martial individuality and intelligent efficiency than the world had ever before or has since witnessed in soldiers of the line. Many college and university graduates fought through the war with only the rank of private soldiers, and have since attained to positions of high civic distinction, having become consuls and ministers, judges and governors, Congressmen and Senators. The late Thomas B. Turley, United States Senator from Tennessee, was only a private soldier in the Confederate Army, and afterwards became an eminent lawyer and jurist. What other nation has furnished literati and authors, philosophers and scientists, advocates and jurists, orators and statesmen, lawgivers and civic rulers from the private ranks of its disbanded armies? This is an exceptional distinction and belongs to our land alone. So that Senator McENERY was one among many of our able and eminent men after the war who did not attain high military rank during our great American conflict.

But he appears preeminently upon the scene during the dark and dreary days of "reconstruction." For 10 long, weary, and perilous years after the war, during which the government of some of the Southern States was practically a congressional oligarchy and a military despotism, our colleague took an active, conspicuous, and effective part in the memorable struggle of the white people of Louisiana to maintain their racial supremacy and to preserve the white man's civilization. This was at last accomplished, but not fully, until President Hayes drew the bayonet from the breast of Louisiana. The ability, courage, and determination displayed by Senator McENERY, then a private citizen, during this stirring and stormy period, are matters of history, and need not be elaborated here. Suffice it to say, that "he was a tower of strength in the time of trouble." And when peace and tranquillity had been restored to his long-suffering people, they remembered and honored him by making him twice their governor. And when he was elected to the United States Senate in 1896, a public-spirited and prominent citizen of the State, Mr. Percy Roberts, wrote to his wife as follows: "The Lord God still lives and reigns! McENERY is Senator by a vote of 70 to 64. That is good enough for one day." This fervid ejaculation, doubtless the expression of a popular sentiment, of itself alone, implies a splendid eulogy on the ability and character of our departed associate, and is doubly significant as coming from one who was by his side and knew him best, "in the days that tried men's souls."

Finally, our distinguished countryman served the people of his State two full terms in the United States Senate and was serving his third term, when he laid down his arms and "slept with his fathers."

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, Louisiana has a unique and splendid history, and no man of his time is so interwoven with that history as is SAMUEL DOUGLAS McENERY. He was born in Louisiana on May 28, 1837, and his history is comprised in the history of the State from that date until the day of his death.

He was elected first lieutenant and went into the Civil War, and made a good soldier. He was elected lieutenant governor with L. A. Wiltz, and at the death of Gov. Wiltz succeeded him as governor. In a contest for a renomination he was defeated by his comrade-at-arms, Gov. Francis P. Nicholls, and so much were they attached to each other that Gov. Nicholls appointed McENERY on the supreme bench, from which he was elected to the Senate, and was reelected until his death.

It was my strange and peculiar good fortune to feel that I knew this good man intimately before I had ever met him. This was due to the fact that I married a La Fourche girl and visited the La Fourche neighborhood very frequently. That was the home of Gov. Nicholls, and Nicholls's name and McENERY's name were linked together there in the minds of all the old settlers, and I felt that I knew McENERY by mingling with those people and hearing them speak of him and talk about him, and when I came to Congress I met him here. I found in him here the same qualities that I had conceived him to possess from what the people had said of him generally.

McENERY was perhaps not a great orator, not a great statesman, but he was a man great in character. As Ingersoll said of Roscoe Conkling, he "walked the highway of his own will and he kept the company of his self-respect." All through McENERY's life this is brought out plainly: He walked the highway of his own will, and of course he kept the company of his self-respect and all others' respect. He was a gentleman, a kindly man, and disposed to do everything and anything that redounded to Louisiana's glory as a State. I would, if I had time and opportunity afforded, speak of the glories of Louisiana. But time will forbid that. It is enough to say of this man that he was true in every relation of life. He seemed to have a devotion to truth that knew no vacillation, that knew no change. For him to conceive that a thing was right was for him to form an opinion at once and go straight ahead. He seemed to have been molded on David Crockett's homely motto, "Be sure you are right, and then go ahead." As a statesman, as a jurist, as a soldier he shines in this respect more than in all others.

And now, that we have come to pay this feeble respect to his memory, he is gone. The places that knew him will know him no more. But he left behind him, as a tribute to the young men of the land, to his wife, family, and friends, his rich heritage of a good name and a life well spent. He did not leave any great riches, but he left that much, and no man can leave a nobler heritage to his wife, his family, and his friends than the heritage of a clean, pure life devoted to duty.

Mr. MADDEN. Four times during this Congress God has seen fit to call home one of Louisiana's illustrious statesmen; four times have we lost, in each of these, a true friend and a noble citizen. To-day in Congress assembled we endeavor in our humble way to show our appreciation of the worth of the latest of these; to speak outwardly thoughts which have for years been present in the minds of many of us.

On the 28th day of June, 1910, at the venerable age of 73, the Hon. SAMUEL D. McENERY died. In his life he was an amiable, unselfish, sincere friend; an honest, upright citizen; and an able, distinguished Senator. In his death we have lost an invaluable life. Few men have won for themselves more love and respect than this worthy brother of ours; few men have more deserved the homage of the Nation.

Mr. McENERY had an eventful life, and an education which not only surpassed that of our average citizen, but compares well with the highest erudition in our land. His knowledge, acquired from books, from professors, from eminent associates, and from close observation of the various things around him into contact with which his services as a soldier and a public man brought him, was of that practical, wise, and fruitful sort that has made our country what it is. Few men are so constituted that they can be scholarly, professional, practical, successful in business, exalted and yet sympathetic, kind, unselfish, and humble—mixing with the great masses of people with a brotherly love and affection, going among them with that kindly spirit which makes all—

Grapple them to their hearts with hoops of steel.

Ah, his was a beautiful life!

In the Senate and in the House of Representatives there are Members, each going about his duty as of old, laughing, chatting, working, thinking.

But yet I know where e'er I go,
That there has passed away a glory from the earth.

I feel that one of the best of us has responded to Stern Ruin's call. It saddens me at times when I see one by one noble, generous lives taken from among us, when I miss them in the customed place, when I cease to hear the well-known voice, or to receive the hearty handshake—it saddens me when I reflect that all Await alike the inevitable hour.

The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

But the sadness gradually merges into thoughtfulness, and then, thank God, I realize, with a rush of joyous feeling,

That our death is but a sleep and a forgetting;
* * * * *
Trailing clouds of glory, do we come
From God, who is our home.

And when I consider this man's merits, his courtesy and kindness, his nobility of character, his patriotism, his love and gentle sympathy, and fondly feel the soft atmosphere of his influence about me, I again find comfort in Wordsworth—

What though the radiance which was once so bright
Be now forever taken from my sight,
* * * * * *
We will grieve not, rather find
Strength in what remains behind;
In the primal sympathy
Which having been must ever be;
In the soothing thoughts that spring
Out of human suffering;
In the faith that looks through death.

Mr. McENERY received his broad education at various leading institutions in this country—at Springfield College, near Mobile, Ala.; at the United States Naval Academy; at the University of Virginia; and, finally, at the National Law School, in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where he acquired a profound knowledge in the profession which he afterwards adopted. It was a wide range over which he swept to gain this learning, but it was not a mere vague, frivolous flight, from which he merged with a smattering of its fruit; it was a patient, toiling course, which built up a firm foundation worthy to sustain in after life the noble character, the distinguished man, the exalted statesman.

I stand before you to-day with love and honor for the memory of the late Senator. He was a man worthy to be honored by men. He was one of us. He lived as we live, had the same temptations as we have, stumbling a little, perhaps, over the roughest places, which only made him the more human, brought him nearer to our hearts and emboldened us to place in him our love and trust.

A creature not too bright or good
For human nature's daily food;
For transient sorrows, simple wiles,
Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears, and smiles.

He was a typical Southern gentleman, genial, open-hearted, and courteous, endearing himself to all with whom he came in contact, thus acquiring an extensive acquaintance among all classes of people, and leaving behind him mourners without number.

Large was his bounty and his soul sincere.

Such is the way of life that this great man will perhaps in a few weeks cease to be missed by his fellow Senators and Representatives, from whom he won such high esteem during the long term of his service, but he will never be forgotten by them and will always be thought of with a lingering fondness and remembered as a glorious type of manhood.

I will no further seek his merits to disclose, for in my humble way I can not do such a great man justice. I leave the details for those of you who are more able than I. I merely wish to join with you, to join with Louisiana, to join with the Nation in paying tribute to the loved and honored memory of Senator SAMUEL D. McENERY, and to extend to his sorrowing friends and relatives my deepest condolence and sincere sympathy.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, SAMUEL DOUGLAS McENERY was born in Monroe, La., May 28, 1837. His father, a native of Ireland, moved to this country when a boy and settled at Petersburg, Va., where he married. After living there awhile, he moved to Louisiana, residing first in Morehouse Parish and then in Ouachita, where he became a cotton planter. In politics he was a Whig, but later, during Know-Nothingism in Louisiana, he became a Democrat. Senator McENERY's uncle, for whom he was named, was appointed a judge on the Federal bench of Florida by President Tyler, and after the Civil War became a member of the supreme court of that State. John McEnery, a brother of the deceased Senator, was elected governor of the State of Louisiana on the Democratic ticket in 1872, but on account of the intervention of Federal troops, called by Gov. Kellogg, he was prevented from taking his seat.

Senator McENERY was educated at Spring Hill College, near Mobile, Ala., and was afterwards appointed a midshipman in the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, where he completed his course, but after a two years' cruise resigned before his graduation. From there he went to the University of Virginia, where he remained until the death of his father in 1857. He then matriculated in the Law College of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and from that institution he was graduated in 1859. After graduation he went to Marysville, Mo., where he practiced law until the outbreak of the war between the States, when he at once returned to Louisiana.

At the outset of the war he helped to organize the Pelican Grays and was made first lieutenant of that command, which subsequently became a part of the Second Louisiana Regiment. That regiment immediately went to the front and with it he remained until its reorganization. He then helped to organize a company which formed part of Logan's Battery of Heavy Artillery and was assigned to duty in the Trans-Mississippi Department.

At the termination of the war he returned to the parish of Ouachita to realize that the fortune of his family had been blasted by war. Thus impoverished, he resumed the duties of private life and became a school-teacher, and while so engaged studied the civil law in order to prepare himself for admission to the Louisiana bar, where the amended Code Napoleon at that time was, as it still is, in force.

He successfully passed his examination and was admitted in 1867 to the bar of the State of Louisiana, practicing in the hill parishes of north Louisiana.

Scarcely had the young soldier entered into the practice of his profession in Louisiana than he was brought to a full realization that reconstruction laws overwhelmed the people of his State, as they overwhelmed at that time the people of other States of the South. McENERY had become well known and well beloved throughout north Louisiana, and by his magnetism, his faculty for making friends, his devotion to duty, his training as a soldier, and his patriotism, he was well equipped, indeed, to take an effective part in the contest between righteousness and debauchery, oppression and good government, barbarism and white supremacy. He was a strong and active figure in every one of those movements which after many years of struggle resulted in the annihilation of radicalism and carpetbagism in Louisiana and placing the government of that State into the hands of the white people.

In 1876 McENERY rallied the people of north Louisiana to the support of Gen. Francis Tillou Nicholls, the maimed hero of many battles during the Civil War, who was the Democratic nominee for governor, and McENERY was, to a great extent, responsible for the success of his candidacy. The election of Gov. Nicholls was the termination of a long-drawn contest by which the people of Louisiana reentered into their own. This patriot and hero is still living, having added to his service to his country during the Civil War, services equally, if not more, valuable in the position of governor, chief justice, and associate justice of the supreme court of Louisiana, from which last office he has, on account of his old age, recently resigned, and in his retirement is presently enjoying the remaining years of his life in well-earned rest.

After the election of Gov. Nicholls in 1876 the United States Senate sent an investigating committee to Louisiana to investigate that election. Chief Justice E. D. White, of the Supreme Court of the United States, than whom Louisiana has produced no greater man; E. B. Krutschmitt, unfortunately taken from us in the prime of his usefulness, a man of remarkable legal acumen, unblemished character, and of a high order of patriotism, nephew of that former brilliant Senator from Louisiana, the lamented Judah P. Benjamin, who, after retiring from the Senate, occupied several offices in the Confederate cabinet under Mr. Davis; and SAMUEL DOUGLAS McENERY represented the Democratic Party in that investigation. Its result failed to disturb the seat of Nicholls as governor of Louisiana.

The new constitution adopted in 1879 by the white people of Louisiana to supplant that of 1868, enacted by the carpetbaggers and negroes, made it necessary to elect another governor. Louis Alfred Wiltz, a man of wonderful attainments, well versed in the affairs of our State, with considerable experience acquired as mayor of the city of New Orleans, was nominated by the Democrats for governor, and SAMUEL DOUGLAS McENERY for lieutenant governor. Wiltz, unfortunately for Louisiana, lived but a short while after being sworn in as chief executive of the State, and McENERY, by operation of law, succeeded him. Taking up the reins of government where Wiltz had left them, he assumed control of the affairs of Louisiana at a time when everything was in turmoil; when the finances of the State had to be recouped; when the devastating waters of the Mississippi were overflowing the fertile plantations of Louisiana, adding another catastrophe to those of war and reconstruction, which had so impoverished the people of the State. His was a Herculean task, but he was equal to it, and it was not long before conditions were restored to their normal state. The money of the people commenced to be properly used and the levee system to be reconstructed. At the expiration of his term as governor he found no difficulty in securing a reelection, thus continuing the magnificent work which he had undertaken; and at the end of his second term, in 1888, he was generally known throughout Louisiana as the "levee governor," and that appellation was applied to him during the balance of his life.

McENERY was succeeded in 1888 by Gov. Nicholls, who had been a predecessor, and immediately upon entering into the duties of his office he appointed McENERY associate justice of the supreme court of Louisiana, the appointment being for a period of 12 years. So, in 1890, when the contest for the renewal of the charter of the State lottery became an issue before the Louisiana Legislature, McENERY was a member of the supreme court and a known and avowed opponent of the Louisiana State lottery.

The unequal contest in the legislature against the State lottery was led by Senator Foster, and the fight was carried forward until the Democratic Party divided in 1892 on the issue, resulting in two Democratic nominations being made for the office of governor. Senator Foster became the candidate of the antilottery wing of the party and made the valiant fight which ended in driving from the State that infamous institution. Senator McENERY, then a justice on the supreme bench, became the choice of the prolottery Democrats and was nominated by them. Later a primary election was held between Foster and McENERY, each the nominee of the wings into which the party had become divided, resulting in the nomination of Foster for governor.

McENERY remained on the bench until 1896, when another contest arose in the State. This time the contest was between the Democrats who had nominated Gov. Foster to succeed himself and a fusion of Republicans, Populists, and disgruntled Democrats. While Foster was elected, the disaffected elements carried the contest into the legislature, and the effect of that contest had direct bearing on the election of a United States Senator to succeed Senator Blanchard, whose term of office was to expire the following year.

Senator Blanchard, afterwards as splendid and efficient a governor as our State ever had, was a candidate; Andrew Price, my immediate predecessor in this House, one of the best men it has ever been my good fortune to know—a clean, honest, benign, and munificent gentleman, who was called much too soon from the midst of those whose favor he so justly merited—was also a candidate; as was Judge W. F. Blackman, a man of great magnetism and remarkable ability, a distinguished jurist of Louisiana, who continues to occupy a position on the bench of that State, reflecting credit on the people who have elevated him to that office; and another aspirant was Mr. Walter D. Denegre, a splendid representative of the old French families of Louisiana, who represented the allied forces, while Blanchard, Price, and Blackman were members of the regular Democracy. To elect one of those four candidates it seemed impossible. Judge McENERY, who, though not a candidate, had been receiving three votes during the daily balloting before the legislature, was sent for one evening; he went to Baton Rouge and on the next day was elected United States Senator. This was effected by the withdrawal from the race of Blanchard, Price, and Blackman.

I was elected to this House and entered into the duties of my office at the same time that McENERY was sworn into the United States Senate—March, 1897. In passing, I state with just pride that Senator McENERY and I never disagreed upon any public question nor ever voted differently during our service in Congress.

I so distinctly remember the wide publicity which was given to the fact that Senator McENERY's election had cost him only $2.35—the railroad fare between New Orleans and Baton Rouge. That a Senator at that time could be elected at so little an expense came almost as a revelation, and it was a subject of comment as a matter of conversation and newspaper and magazine publication. And I want to add, right here, that it can be said that his subsequent reelections to the Senate, in 1902 and 1908, cost him as little as his first election to that body, as in neither campaign did he have an opponent for the nomination in the primaries or at the election by the legislature.

Senator McENERY was repeatedly elected a delegate to the Democratic national conventions, and was chairman of the Louisiana delegation at the Chicago convention which nominated Mr. Bryan in 1896.

The Senator's service in the United States Senate was highly honorable, indeed; and, while it might not be classed as exceedingly brilliant, it was extremely effective and advantageous to his State. The want of brilliancy in his service in the Senate was not occasioned, however, by lack of attainments or oratorical talents; but it was due to a misfortune which overtook him early in his service—a deafness which did not permit him to understand what was going on in the Senate—and excluded him, therefore, from active participation in the running debates of that body. This misfortune multiplied his labors; but he was always thoroughly posted, though, on all public matters. His services were marked by an attention to duty, a devotion to the State and country he loved so well, an honesty of purpose, and a zealous patriotism unsurpassed by anyone who has ever been honored by an election to that distinguished body.

Having been continuously in the service of his State since the inception of the Civil War, and in public office from 1879, yet he never acquired wealth, but died as poor a man as he was when teaching school upon his return from the Civil War. In fact, it was noted through the press of the country that there appeared on his property on which is located his home in the city of New Orleans, where he died, on the very day of his death a notice that the property was for sale.

As to his absorbing attention to duty in the public service and his disregard of self-interest, which did not permit him at any time to accumulate wealth during his long public service in Louisiana and Washington, the same can be said of him that was said of that patriotic and distinguished citizen of Pennsylvania, Samuel J. Randall. In fact, MCENERY's life was very much akin to the life of Randall, who was so much loved throughout the South. Both were of Whig origin; both were essentially democratic—plain, unassuming, patriotic, independent, and devoted to duty. They were men of determination, of courage, moral and physical; devoted to the Democratic Party, to which they belonged, and both protectionists. In all other questions, however, party mandate was, in their view of public life, a public duty. Upon the tariff they invariably disagreed with their Democratic colleagues, but that disagreement was not accompanied with disparagement of the fealty which they at all times lent to the cause of the party with which they were affiliated.

It is to be said, perhaps, in behalf of the old Democracy, that there was more tolerance of differences upon nonessentials than there now is under the modern management of the party.

Randall, first elected to the Forty-second Congress, reelected to the Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses, was, on the death of Speaker Kerr in the Forty-fourth Congress, elected Speaker of that Democratic Congress. Twice he was reelected to that high and important office, continuing as Speaker in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, both of which were Democratic.

Throughout his services in the Senate, MCENERY stood by the interest of his State, and in that position he has found in accord with him many sons of Louisiana representing that State in both branches of Congress.

When the Mills bill—a Democratic measure—came to a vote in the Senate in January, 1899, both of the Senators from Louisiana—Eustis and Gibson—voted against its passage.

The McKinley bill passed the House on September 27, 1890. As this bill carried a bounty on sugar, it was generally opposed by the sugar planters of the State of Louisiana, and Wilkinson, Coleman, and Price, representing the first, second, and third districts, respectively, voted against the bill, while Louisiana's other Representatives in the House—Blanchard, Boatner, and Robertson—abstained from voting. Of these, Coleman alone was a Republican. On September 30, 1890, the Senate voted on this measure, and both of our Senators—Eustis and Gibson—failed to cast a vote either for or against the bill.

The Wilson bill—a Democratic measure—passed the House August 13, 1894, and Meyer, Davey, Price, Boatner, and Robertson—all Democrats—voted against it. The seat of the other Member from Louisiana had just been vacated by the appointment of Mr. Blanchard to the United States Senate. The bill passed the Senate July 3, 1894, and our two Senators, Caffery and Blanchard, voted for it. President Cleveland refusing to subscribe his name to it, the measure became law by operation of the Constitution.

The Dingley bill passed the House July 18, 1897, and Meyer, Davey, and myself voted for it, while Ogden, Baird, and Robertson voted against it. It passed the Senate July 3, 1897, with Senator MCENERY voting for and Senator Caffery against it—an equal division of Louisiana's delegation in both House and Senate.

The Payne bill passed the House April 9, 1909, and ESTOPINAL, PUJO, WICKLIFFE, and myself voted for it, while RANSDELL and WATKINS voted against it. Through the death of Congressman Davey the seat from the second district was vacant. It passed the Senate on July 8, 1909, with Senator MCENERY voting in favor of its adoption, while Senator FOSTER registered his vote against the measure. From conference the bill came to the House on July 31, 1909, and PUJO and WICKLIFFE changed their votes from the affirmative and voted against the adoption of the conference report. RANSDELL and WATKINS, who had voted against the bill when it passed the House on April 9, 1909, also voted against the adoption of the conferees' report, while ESTOPINAL and myself voted in favor of the report of the conference committee.

I well recall the conference held by the Louisiana delegation in Senator MCENERY's office to determine the course to be pursued by the delegation with respect to this last measure. The delegation favored the bill in some particulars and opposed it in others. Senator MCENERY immediately laid down the rule which he said should be our guidance: Will this bill as a whole benefit or injure Louisiana? He argued pointedly that what benefited the people of Louisiana was paramount. One section, he said, can not be made to suffer unless the entire State suffered likewise. We were, he continued, the representatives of the State, and, as such, should look to the interest of its people as a whole. Resuming, he said that these rules were his guidance; and by these rules his conduct as a Senator was always guided.

Occupying that position, he has never been held not to have performed the duties incumbent upon him in a patriotic manner, nor was he ever looked upon with suspicion by his Democratic colleagues in the performance of those duties as he conceived them to be any more than the shadow of suspicion ever hovered over Samuel J. Randall, who, though a protectionist, was three times elected Speaker of the House by the Democrats and appointed a member of the Ways and Means Committee in the Forty-seventh Congress by Speaker KEIFER, still a colleague of ours in this House; nor any more than suspicion attached to Samuel M. Robertson, this prince of splendid fellows, who, after casting his vote against the Wilson bill, became a member of the Ways and Means Committee and was elected secretary of the Democratic caucus, holding both the assignment to the Ways and Means Committee and the secretaryship to the caucus for many years until his retirement from Congress.

But these were days when the Democratic Party was wary and suspicious of radicalism, when toleration was the order of the day and conservatism was her north star.

Under our Constitution, in so far as the tariff is concerned, our citizenship may be included into two broad classes—those who advocate protection and those who advocate tariff for revenue. Among protectionists may be included extreme Republicans; and among the Democrats may be included those other extremists, who would advocate free trade if that were possible under our Constitution. The difference between the tariff-for-revenue man and the protectionist is, therefore, expressed in percentage. If we accept the ad valorem basis as the true basis for the purpose of this illustration, or if we reduce the tariff law to an ad valorem basis, it would appear that those who advocate an average ad valorem duty of 40 per cent, that being assumed as the percentage that would bring sufficient revenue into the Treasury, would be looked upon as adherents of the policy of tariff for revenue, while those who advocate a 45 per cent ad valorem average, that percentage being assumed as more than necessary to produce the required revenue, would be regarded as protectionists.

On both ends of this proposition there are, of course, extremes, for the free trader would cut the 40 per cent average and take chances of a deficiency in the Treasury, while, on the other hand, the high or "stand-pat" protectionist would increase it above the average of 45 per cent and take the same chances. If this be true, who is to judge when the tariff on a given article is a revenue tariff and when it is a protective tariff? The people of each district must decide for themselves, and the Representative of that district should voice the decision of his constituency; the people of each State should decide for themselves and the Senator should voice the opinion of his State. This was Senator MCENERY's rule of guidance, and his people approved of it by reelecting him again and again without opposition.

Fundamentally speaking, the Democratic Party is built upon the idea of individual liberty in its broadest sense and scope within the limitations fixed by the Federal Constitution. That scope essentially includes the principles of local self-government; that scope includes State sovereignty, which is the broader expression of local self-government, and necessarily contemplates that the Representative, if he be a Member of the House, should receive his primary instructions from the constituency composing his district. And the Senator, representing a sovereign State, should receive, primarily, his instructions from the people of his State.

In the early days, during the time that Mr. Randall was a Member of this House, among Democrats caucuses were unknown; conferences were the order of the day. Democratic Members met in conference, looked into a situation, discussed and sought to convince each other that unity of action was important, and sought a common ground upon which to stand. Where, however, instructions of a constituency contravened, the result of the conference was not mandatory upon the Member.

In so far as Democratic Congressmen were concerned, this continued to be the rule of action in both the House and Senate, and it is only of late that a different course of action has been inaugurated. When this new course was adopted and the caucus resorted to in place of the conference, rules to safeguard the people in keeping with Democratic doctrine were adopted.

The rule itself, in so far as Democratic Members of the House are concerned, had best be quoted as a thorough exemplification of the fact that the principle of the party has never been abandoned in the substitution of the caucus for the conference, but that the integrity of State sovereignty and local self-government has been maintained in theory at least. I quote from the rules adopted by the Democratic caucus:

That no Member shall be bound upon questions involving a construction of the Constitution of the United States or upon which he made contrary pledges to his constituents prior to his election or received contrary instructions by resolutions or platform from his nominating authority.

This is the wording of the proviso; this is in keeping with the principles contended for and the policy pursued by Senator McENERY as a member of the Senate; and I take some little pride in the fact that, because of my course, perhaps, these exceptions, essential as they are to the very life of democracy, responding to a will of the government by the people, recognizing the sovereignty of the State and local self-government, have been recognized in very words, as they should ever be in Democratic practice. Let the theorist theorize, but let men of thought measure their power by their authority. Let them not surrender the power, but better that than to usurp authority not delegated.

The Congressman—and I use the word in its true sense—is but the agent of the people who, or the State which, sends him here. The principle, in so far as a Member of the House is concerned, is that those who elect that Member have a right to instruct him in regard to their interests, and the Representative has absolutely no right to act adversely to such instructions. When his conscience will not permit him to carry out these instructions, the Congressman's plain duty is to resign his office or, better still, not to accept the office, unless it is his purpose to act agreeable to the instructions of his constituency.

A State which sends a Senator to the higher body has unquestionably the right to instruct its Senator; and whenever it is impossible for the Senator to reconcile his conscience or his judgment with his instructions, then his mission is to forego the office and permit the State to send some one who will carry out the instructions of its people.

Such was always Senator McENERY's conception of his duties, and a broad toleration of those principles in a militant democracy but enlarges and broadens the people's conception of duty, lends itself to confidence in legislation, and removes every opportunity for suspicions and criticisms, which always tend to undermine the people's belief in the integrity of legislative bodies.

Senator McENERY was a man of great simplicity of character; he greeted everybody most kindly; he was courageous in doing what he believed was right in carrying out instructions of those he represented; he was fearless in asserting his opinion; and such qualities as these endeared him to the people of Louisiana.

He was a man of heroic soul, poor in the goods of this world, but infinitely rich in a fame that outlives him; an unsullied reputation, to which his legion of friends in Louisiana and elsewhere can point with unceasing pride and bid future generations to emulate his honesty, his fairness, his independence, and his patriotism. And in those respects he stands as an exemplar to all men who are devoted to a constitutional government and who are striving to elevate the people in the enjoyment of those things which are decreed sacred and inalienable—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Great son of north Louisiana, permit a fellow citizen of south Louisiana to assure you that you are no more honored and your loss is no more keenly felt in the hills of your section of our State than on the plains of south Louisiana. In common with your neighbors of the hills, we call you our own. Surely, your deeds were for our entire State and your statesmanship broader than any section.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, Louisiana, like Virginia, has been particularly unfortunate in the loss of Representatives during the past decade. Louisiana has lost five by death and Virginia seven since I have been a Member of this Congress. Senator McENERY and myself entered the Fifty-fifth Congress together. For a short time he lived at the same hotel with me. During all the years that have passed since 1897 he was very near me. I often met and talked with him at the Metropolitan Hotel. We had much in common, being about the same age, having entered the Civil War about the same time and served with John Bankhead Magruder on the historic Peninsula of Virginia; he with the infantry and I with the cavarly arm of the service.

For this reason, no doubt, my good friends and colleagues of the State of Louisiana have requested me to unite with them in these solemn ceremonies for the purpose of paying tribute to the life and character of another Member of Congress from their State.

SAMUEL DOUGLAS MCENERY was distinctly a Louisianian. For thirty-odd years he bore a conspicuous part in her history, largely shaping her policies and aiding in her upward pogress. In the trying days of reconstruction he proved his worth as counselor, guide, and public servant. Loyal in friendship, fervid in patriotism, a profound thinker, with high ideals and broad liberal views, he labored incessantly for the good of his State and his people.

He held the highest honors Louisiana could bestow and was trusted with her most important affairs. He incurred criticism and censure, but his motives were never questioned, and no charge of corruption or betrayal of trust was ever imputed to him by even his bitterest enemies.

This alone is praise enough for any man who was an active leader and worker in every political movement in his State for more than 30 years.

SAMUEL DOUGLAS MCENERY was born May 28, 1837, and died June 28, 1910. He was a native of Monroe County, La. He attended Spring Hill College, near Mobile; the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis; the University of Virginia; and the State and National Law School, at Poughkeepsie.

Just of age when the Civil War came on, he enlisted in the Confederate service as second lieutenant in Company C, Second Louisiana Infantry, and served in the Army of the Peninsula, Virginia, under Gen. John Bankhead Magruder, to May 1, 1862, on which day he is reported dropped by reason of the reorganization of his company. During his connection with the Second Louisiana Infantry his regiment participated in the engagement at Lees Mill during the siege of Yorktown by the Union Army under Gen. George B. McClellan. On July 23, 1862, McENERY was appointed second lieutenant and drillmaster, to report to Brig. Gen. Albert G. Blanchard, and served with gallantry and distinction in the trans-Mississippi to the close of the war.

The principles for which he fought and the righteousness of his case is being recognized as the years roll by. In a few short years thinking men will say that possibly after all it would have been better for constitutional government and human liberty had the principles contended for by the South in that great struggle been established and maintained.

We can not contemplate the rapid passing away of these old Confederate soldiers without remembering the conditions after their defeat that tried, even more than war, their courage, patience, and fortitude. History is searched in vain for a parallel. In the era of good feeling of to-day we do not like to dwell on the helpless and hopeless condition of the Southern soldiers after Appomattox. Under good laws, well administered, it would have been a Herculean task to restore their fallen fortunes. Success, in spite of the worst legislation that ever afflicted a fallen and suffering people is simply a marvel, and stamps these men as the best, the bravest, and the truest that have ever lived in all the tide of time.

The philosophical historian of the future will tell the wonderful story of their achievements in peace, and our children's children will set it to their credit as equal, if not surpassing, the victories they won in war.

Such is my faith in the people of our Southland that I predict with confidence that before the last old Confederate soldier shall join his comrades on the other side he will see his beloved South stronger in material resources and richer per capita than any part of this Union.

MCENERY was a leader in the political campaign of 1876, and largely through his brilliant leadership his party's success was made possible, and redemption from the horrors and misrule of reconstruction was accomplished in Louisiana.

His state never forgot these services, nor will the name of MCENERY ever cease to be associated with that sadly needed redemption.

In 1879, though not in accord with the dominant political faction, he was nominated for lieutenant governor, and became governor in 1881 by the death of Gov. Wiltz. He was reelected in 1884, and was defeated for nomination by Gen. Nicholls in the convention of 1888, and was by him appointed as associate justice of the supreme court.

In 1896 he was appealed to as the only Democrat who could be elected to the United States Senate against the coalition in the legislature of populists and Republicans.

His action before the Democratic caucus on this occasion perhaps gives a truer line on his life and character than any other occasion afforded, and shows the beacon by which MCENERY steered his course through life. He frankly and fearlessly told that caucus his views and convictions on leading political questions; that he was a protectionist; was in favor of national improvements, with broad national views on various other questions, and if elected would follow his convictions regardless of party views and platforms.

He concealed nothing and conceded nothing as against his convictions of right and duty. Frankness, openness, and independence marked every day of his life to its close. When McENERY was harshly criticized by many Democratic journals and leaders, his defense was that his views were made known before his election; that the Democrats accepted him under these conditions, thus granting him independence. He was reelected in 1902 and in 1908, and twice submitted his name to the popular vote.

No Senator enjoyed or exercised more absolute independence than McENERY. His colleagues and his constituents fully realized that his convictions controlled his votes, regardless of party platforms and views.

A most effective and diligent worker, no labor was too great, no duty was too small to claim his courteous and painstaking attention at any time. Dignified, cordial, polite, whether to governor or newsboy, he won the confidence and respect of all. His characteristics of manner, his faculty for making friends in every sphere of life aided greatly in the results he accomplished. While manners did not make the man, it did make the man's work more easy and effective and made an able and distinguished man a delightful friend and companion.

So appropriate are the words of an editorial of the New Orleans Times-Democrat of June 29, 1910, that I shall here quote them:

All recognized McENERY as a faithful servant of Louisiana and its people, always ready to work in their interest and never thinking of himself, for he acquired little or nothing in his thirty-odd years of public service, and he served all who applied to him with equal zeal and earnestness. No man was naturally kinder of heart, more considerate of others, and there have been few men in active political life in Louisiana who have made more friends; indeed, during the latter days of his life he received the faithful support of those who had been most heartily opposed to him during the stormy days of factionalism in Louisiana, in which he played so important a part. No one will deny that in him Louisiana has lost a faithful and devoted son.

He measured up to every duty and obligation. He was vigilant, active, and efficient, and singularly successful in the accomplishment of results. His strong, active mind and business habits enabled him to grasp the salient point in every problem with ease and dispatch. His large experience and extensive acquaintance in life gave him a breadth of view that made him agreeable and pleasant in conference as well as fair-minded in the settling of all differences.

Ripe in years and honors, beloved and mourned by the State he so ably and efficiently served, honored and respected by his colleagues and his Nation, he rests from his labors. His deeds and influences live after him, a model and example to admire and emulate. His ambitions realized; his patient, untiring efforts crowned with rich success; his life work done, he sleeps in peace and love and honor in the sacred soil of the State he loved so dearly and served so faithfully.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, we have met on this peaceful Sabbath to pay tribute to the memory of one of our late associates. Though but a short time, Congress has had many losses by death since we closed our labors in June last.

It is sad, indeed, to know that so many of our friends have been called to answer the last summons of the Supreme Ruler of the Universe.

One by one they have fallen, dying in the midst of careers of usefulness. Better thus than drag along for years in suffering and worry, with nothing to cheer them in the way of future deeds commensurate with past achievements.

Better far to pass to the other shore while able to perform acts of usefulness to the country and of benefit to mankind.

To-day we meet to honor the memory of SAMUEL DOUGLAS McENERY, a distinguished Senator from the State of Louisiana.

He lived beyond the allotted space of three score and ten.

His life was one of usefulness and distinction. Of him and his life the words of Emerson fitly apply.

Life is too short to waste
The critic's bite or cynic's bark.
Quarrel or reprimand;
'Twill soon be dark;
Up! Mind thine own aim, and God speed the mark.

He was honored by the people of his State as a justice of the supreme court, as governor, and as United States Senator.

In all these positions he served with rare ability and honesty, reflecting credit on his Commonwealth and the Nation.

His name and deeds add luster to the history of the great men produced by this country since its creation.

A sterling character, a good soldier, a patriotic citizen, an upright judge, and renowned as the chief executive of a great State, his deeds live after him.

Such men can only be found in a republic where equal opportunities exist to all its people.

It was my special privilege to have seen our friend in his home city a few years since, and then among his close personal friends and associates to study his character and witness the respect and affection in which he was held by those who had known him all their lives.

He was the soul of hospitality, generous and kind to all, especially to the stranger within the city.

His feelings for the veterans of the Federal Army, whose character and fighting qualities he learned to respect and admire in the days that tried men's souls, never left him.

He was always willing to accord to them every possible recognition, and was exceedingly liberal in his views as to pensions for the boys in blue who had saved the Nation.

As a comrade serving under a different flag, I am impelled by a sense of duty to lay this brief, simple tribute on the grave of an honored patriotic citizen of our common country.

He has gone from among us, having crossed to the other shore in the full hope of a blessed immortality.

It is a road that we must all travel, for it is appointed unto man once to die. This decree is unalterable; all must meet it. Let us meet it, as he did, bravely.

The memory of the life and deeds of our friend is ours to cherish and emulate.

He sleeps, but in that sleep beneath the sod
No dreams shall come—those dreams that banish sleep;
No watchers, then, naught save the eyes of God,
To watch his slumber long and still and deep.
Then mourn him not as dead—he can not die—
And mourn him not as sleeping in that day;
He wakes, he lives, not far in yonder sky,
But near us, though not seen, he walks to-day.

His memory will abide with his family and friends a benediction and a blessing.

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker, the people of the district I have the honor to represent on this floor had great affection for Senator McENERY while living, and now that he is no more they respect and venerate his memory. His name is not only treasured by the people, but his achievements in the upbuilding of his State are recorded in her history. His crowning public service is usually considered as having been the development of the levee system of Louisiana, because of his great and successful efforts in that behalf, but in my judgment his work in encouraging emigration from other States resulted in the betterment of conditions in Louisiana more than any other act of his public career.

I remember that in 1887 he convoked a great interstate agricultural convention at Lake Charles. United States Senators, Representatives, and others high in every line of human endeavor gathered there and obtained at first hand knowledge of the possibilities of the State.

Mr. Speaker, the result of that convention in the material development and settlement of southwest Louisiana was frequently adverted to by Senator McENERY as one of the crowning acts of his administration while governor of that great State. It brought a population of thrifty farmers from the North and the West into a section of the country then used for stock raising only, and that part of the State at this time is thickly populated and more than a hundred million dollars have been added to the taxable value of Louisiana, to say nothing of the great number of splendid citizens who have made their homes with us.

Mr. Speaker, I did not belong to the then political faction in the division of our party in Louisiana of which Senator McENERY was leader and to which reference has been made. I found myself on the other side. I was never thrown in close contact with him, but always entertained, in common with the people of Louisiana, the highest respect for his integrity and the greatest admiration for his ability.

When I came to the Fifty-eighth Congress Senator McENERY extended to me, always, when I called upon him for assistance every help within his power; he was ever courteous, and it seemed to be a labor of love for him to assist his colleagues in obtaining legislation at the other end of the Capitol.

I then began to understand why it was that he was so strong and so popular with those who knew him best. His uniform courtesy, his absolute sincerity, his freedom from guile, appealed to all the better instincts of man and not only invited, but compelled the greatest degree of respect. In Louisiana many people have often asked the question, Why was Senator McENERY so popular? In the first place, Mr. Speaker, it is because he was an honest man and a truthful man, capstoned by unquestioning loyalty to his friends.

His great success in public life was due to that cause above all others, and a State is to be congratulated when her public men place such an estimate upon their words, upon their actions, upon their positions as to invite the admiration of their friends and challenge the respect of their enemies. Louisiana has lost a great public servant, his family one who devoted his life to their welfare and advancement, and his friends one whom they will regret as long as they have the memory to recall his devotion to them under any and all circumstances.

Mr. PADGETT said:

I live for those who love me,
For those who know me true;
For the God who made me
And the good that I may do.

Mr. Speaker, these lines were written years ago, and in their sentiment may be found an accurate understanding of the motives of Senator McENERY. They afford an explanation of the motives and purposes of his life. The mainspring of his conduct was reflected in those lines. Through them there shines a light that brings into bold relief the influences which mark and emphasize his life and his work.

Though there was a great difference in our ages, there existed a warm personal friendship between us. Having a considerable family connection in my home town, among the best and most honored of our citizenship, he visited the town. He upon the Senate Naval Committee and myself upon the House Naval Committee, our work brought us into association and fellowship. From the 1st to the 4th day of June, 1910, we were upon the Board of Visitors together at the Naval Academy at Annapolis. I believe it was the 28th of the same month that he was called hence. It never occurred to me during this last association and labor that so soon would he be translated.

It is my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to speak only a few words as to the impressions I had of him. The influences of his life, association with him, fellowship with him, made upon me certain impressions as to his character, as to the principles and motives which actuated him in his conduct, and it is of these that I rise to speak. I shall not attempt to review his work in his political and active life in his own State. Others have already spoken eloquently and in detail of the splendid career and of the magnificent work which he did in his own State. I shall content myself in this respect to say that in his own State in those dark days, in those troublous times, he was a rock in a weary land and a shelter in a time of storm.

I shall speak of him first as a man with a big heart, and such he did possess. In the language of the first line of the verse, "I live for those who love me," truly Senator McENERY did so. He loved his friends. There was no sacrifice for them—in their interest, for their welfare, for their well-being, for the elevation and promotion of their interest and their upbuilding—which he was not willing to make. Out of his heart at all times there flowed a stream of affection and unceasing love for his friends. He was true to his friends, and for them he was not only willing to sacrifice, but he was ready to go further. For them he was ready to labor and to toil, to give of the energy and of the power of his life and of his being. And no more can be said that carries a higher attribute than to say of a man that he had a heart full of love for his friends.

There is another phase in the life of this man, an element of his character, which was fundamental, of which I desire to speak, and that is that in the broad, deep, high, and noble sense of the word he was a patriot. He loved his country. He loved her history, he felt a pride and personal interest in the institutions, in the spirit and the genius of the people, of the country, and of its citizenship. From the foundation of the country until this day there was no noble deed performed, there was no noble illustration of patriotic purpose or high achievement, for which Senator McENERY did not feel and claim a personal interest and manifest a personal appreciation. His patriotism was not bounded and limited by the confines of his own State. I would not be understood to minimize his love for his own State and his own people. I would emphasize and magnify it, and yet as great as was his love for his own State and the institutions of his own people and his own citizenship, his patriotism rose above and was broader and comprehended the history of the whole country and the love and fellowship of all the people.

He shared the hopes of the future of the country. Although he had reached a ripe age in his years, he had not turned his face to the rear. He faced the future, and in the future of the country, in the development of its industries, in the progress of the people, the enlarged spheres of usefulness that are reserved for the generations to come in that higher, nobler, larger, more generous civilization that is to be the heritage of our children and our children's children as the fruit of the labors of this and past generations, he looked with confidence and assurance, and felt a lively interest and expectation in the glories of our country yet to come.

He was a brave man. No man could ever say that he concealed his convictions. What he believed he believed, and he hid it from no man. Having the courage of his convictions, he was tenacious to his duty. He was not a coward in the face of responsibility. He met boldly and frankly and openly the discharge of every duty that came to him in the conscious conviction of what he believed was right.

There is one trait of his character upon which I desire to speak with peculiar pride. He was a courteous gentleman. He belonged to that old school wherein politeness was regarded as a superior virtue. I would not speak it, Mr. Speaker, as a criticism, and yet I do desire to call attention to it. In the present day, in the tumult and the hurry and the bustle and the confusion and the strife incident to the conditions that surround us, I sometimes feel that the present generation does not have that regard, that veneration, for that superb element of character—politeness, courteous and dignified demeanor—which characterized our fathers and our grandfathers; and it differentiates, if you please, the unpolished diamond from the polished diamond. In this respect Senator McENERY was a polished diamond.

I may add that he was a true man.

I live for those who love me,
For those who know me true.

He loved the truth. He loved the truth, not for policy's sake, not because it might be expedient, but because there was implanted in his heart, there was ingrained in his soul, the love of that which is true, of that which is real, of that which is genuine. He despised hypocrisy. He hated a sham. He admired integrity of character and nobility of purpose, and ever strove to measure his own conduct by that high standard that ever makes the measure of a true man. He was true to his convictions of duty. He was true to his country. He was true to the obligations of citizenship. He was true to the obligations of friendship, and there I may observe, Mr. Speaker, that citizenship and friendship impose obligations. He was not forgetful that as a citizen obligations rested upon him, obligations which should mark and shape his own conduct and his own actions; obligations which should control his relationship with his fellows, and which should mark the discharge of his duty toward the institutions of his country; and in the long years of his life, in the long years of his public service, varied as they were, no man can put his hand upon one act of the life of this man and say, "Herein was he false to his duty and the obligations to his country and its citizenship."

He was a man of broad sympathies. He had humanitarian views. His sympathies were as broad, as tender, and as generous as his conceptions of his duty to humanity. He was a man of broad intellectual vision. He did not live in the low valley of ignorance and superstition. He had ascended a considerable height on the mountain side of knowledge and of information and of learning, and from his viewpoint he was enabled to look out far and wide and have a large vision of the activities of men, the energies of life, and the sympathies of the brotherhood of man; and to these he measured up nobly and grandly.

But, Mr. Speaker, he is gone—they say "dead." If you mean destruction, no. If you mean annihilation, nay. If you mean transition, truly. If you mean the shedding of the habiliments of flesh, that hamper and circumscribe and limit the possibilities, the hopes, the aspirations of the human soul and the human life, yes, indeed. Into a larger, better, more glorious life, where the responsibility shall be greater, where the opportunity shall be larger, where our capacity shall be commensurate with those opportunities, he is gone. As we stand at the grave we say, "We can follow no farther," and yet out of our souls comes the thought—

I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I can not drift
Beyond His love and care.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, Virginia claims the privilege to add her voice to the note of sympathy at the death of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana. There is a strong historic tie that binds Virginia to Louisiana. It was Virginia's Monroe, the fifth President of the United States, who as minister to France in 1803 contracted with Bonaparte for the purchase of the Louisiana Territory, and it was Virginia's Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence and third President of the United States, who proposed to Congress to ratify the purchase, and laid aside his scruples as to the constitutionality of the measure in order to add to the Union the immense territory that stretches from the Mississippi to the Oregon—an empire that exceeded the conquest of Cortez and lay beyond the dream of Alexander.

My claim as a Virginian to offer my tribute to the deceased rests also on the fact that he was educated in part at the university of my State, and it is not inappropriate to pause for a moment to remark that it was, most likely, the splendid mental training he received at the Virginia University which enabled him to accomplish the great work he did, and achieve the great reputation which will send his name resounding down the corridors of time.

Mr. Speaker, never was there a more chivalrous and courteous gentleman, a more genial and sympathetic nature, a more independent and courageous character than Senator SAMUEL DOUGLAS MCENERY. He was the very soul of courtesy and self-respecting dignity and demeanor.

He had splendid natural mental endowments and enjoyed the advantage of a very thorough intellectual training in early life. He was educated at Spring Hill College, Ala., the United States Naval Academy, and the University of Virginia, and was a graduate of the State and National Law School at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. He was thus well equipped for the severe strain which his subsequent career imposed upon him, and this mental equipment was reenforced by an indomitable will and an unconquerable determination to succeed.

When the Civil War broke out, Senator MCENERY had just attained his majority. He did not hesitate a moment, but enlisted in the Confederate Army and served with distinction throughout the entire war.

When the war ended he returned to his native State and rapidly rose to the head of the legal profession.

For more than 30 years he had been a leader in the political affairs of his State and the Nation. Every honor which an appreciative constituency could bestow was heaped upon him. He was lieutenant governor of Louisiana, then governor, then associate justice of the supreme court of the State, and was then three times elected to the United States Senate.

Senator MCENERY was recognized by all of his associates as one of the most upright of men. The finger of suspicion never pointed at him. There was not gold enough in the mines of Alaska to deter him from the performance of a duty.

And so in his career we recognize the honest man, the diligent student, the courageous soldier, the accomplished lawyer, the constructive State builder, the jurist, and the statesman.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Speaker, when SAMUEL DOUGLAS MCENERY died, full of years and public service—I will not say full of honors, as the stereotyped phrase goes, for place and position do not honor such a man—there died one of the greatest men I ever knew. He not only had the great mind that encompassed and illumined every subject he touched, but he had the great heart, the broad human sympathy, which gave understanding and made constructive statesmanship easy and natural. He was not a leader of men in the usual acceptance of the term; he was more than that; he was the diviner of ways, the solver of difficulties, the meeter of trying situations, the one man who was equal to every emergency.

Mr. Speaker, it was in 1872 that my association with Governor MCENERY began—I say "Governor" MCENERY, for that is the designation which seemed to cling to him from his old friends throughout his years of judicial and senatorial service, and I am sure he liked it, from them. From that time on we were friends; and in all the heat of factional strife and through his every political vicissitude, for—for years he was the storm center in Louisiana—I was his supporter, at all times and under all circumstances. On one occasion conditions arose in our State which forced him into a situation which, I think, he would gladly have avoided; not that he thought that he was in the wrong, for I am sure he was sincerely confident that he was in the right. It was not of his seeking, nor even of his accord, that he was placed at the head of a protesting ticket that all realized was destined to defeat. He was defeated, but it was not his defeat, for no self-seeking purpose dominated him. It was the defeat of the party which had called upon him to carry its banner, and he lost nothing of popularity nor the love of the people.

Senator MCENERY had a brilliant war record in the Confederate Army. His political life commenced in 1880, when he was elected lieutenant governor. I was a member of the State senate over which he presided and can recall his popularity with that body, all of whom became his warm admirers and sincere friends. The death of Gov. Wiltz a few months after his inauguration raised him to the gubernatorial chair, and his election for a full term followed at the next State election. He was brought out as a candidate for a third term, but was defeated for nomination by Gov. Francis T. Nicholls, who had been governor, but who had been retired by the constitutional convention of 1879. Recognizing the great ability of his defeated opponent, Gov. Nicholls appointed him an associate justice of the supreme court—a graceful act—which was applauded throughout the State. It was while on the supreme bench that he was drafted to again lead the ticket of his faction of the party and, after a contest in the State convention and in a race before the people, he was finally defeated. A critical situation for the party arose in 1896, which resulted in the election of Justice MCENERY, for he was at that time on the supreme bench of the State, to the United States Senate. He served continuously in the Senate until his death, having been twice reelected without opposition.

Mr. Speaker, Senator MCENERY had that simple honesty which followed the right at all times without thought of effects. He had that loyalty which gave confidence and friendship as well as received it. He had the most democratic spirit and ways of any man I ever knew. As far as rank and station went, men were all one to him. I do not mean to infer that he did not have his warm friendships and chosen confidants, but rank and station had nothing to do even with these, for he had friends in every walk of life to whom he gave his fullest confidence. He faithfully served his State as lieutenant governor, governor, justice of the supreme court, and United States Senator continuously for 30 years, and his sudden death cast a gloom over our entire State.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, we are assembled here on this Sabbath day to perform one of those sad duties which have become so frequent during the sessions of the Sixty-first Congress. Sunday after Sunday finds us in this historic Hall, reverently gathered together to pay our last tribute of respect to the memory of some lamented Senator or Representative. With distressing frequency, on our way to the House to attend our daily duties, our attention has been arrested, and we are again shocked by the sight of the American flag flying at half-mast upon the Capitol, announcing to us that the dread messenger had again appeared in our midst and again served his rude and unwelcome summons.

To-day we meet to commemorate the life, the character, and the services of a distinguished statesman from the Commonwealth of Louisiana, Senator SAMUEL DOUGLAS MCENERY. He was a man whom the people of his native State delighted to honor. Few, even among fortune's favored, have had as many distinguished honors conferred upon them as the people of Louisiana gladly conferred upon their favored and illustrious son. Lieutenant governor, governor, associate justice of the supreme court, and three times elected to the United States Senate is a political record which is rarely found in the sum of one man's life.

For considerably over a quarter of a century Senator MCENERY was an important factor in the political history of Louisiana.

As a Senator he was careful, painstaking, conscientious, and fearless. He at all times represented what he believed to be the best interests of that great State whose commission he held. The welfare and prosperity of Louisiana was ever his aim and purpose, and during his long service in the United States Senate he earnestly labored for the advancement and upbuilding of his native State.

The many positions of trust conferred upon him, the numerous honors given to him by his people, and the continued indorsements he received from the electorate of Louisiana were evidences of his personal popularity, and conclusively show the high esteem and respect in which he was held by the people of his native State.

His claim upon the affections of his people was not based alone upon his political services. He was an officer in the Confederate Army, serving with much distinction in Virginia and in the trans-Mississippi department. But it was during the dark days of reconstruction that Senator MCENERY rendered the conspicuous services which so endeared him to the people of Louisiana. His bold and fearless stand against carpetbaggism, his active opposition to the political vices of the period, and his splendid efforts in behalf of white supremacy will never be forgotten by his grateful people. Much of the admiration he excited in the breasts of the citizens of his Commonwealth can be traced back to his tireless energy, intrepid conduct, and the conspicuous qualities of leadership he displayed during those troublous times.

The distinguished Senator whose memory we commemorate to-day lived a long and useful life, the greater part of which was spent in the service of his country. Despite his advanced age, he was still engaged in this service when the dread messenger came.

Senator McENERY will be missed in Louisiana, that beautiful land of splendid citizenship, or romance, of sunshine, of flowers—the land he loved so well. That land will know him no more; he has passed away, but he is not forgotten, for he has left behind him, enshrined in the hearts of the people of Louisiana, a priceless legacy, "the memory of earnest deeds well done."

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a melancholy thought, when we reflect, that when those whom we knew in this life have passed away we will see them on earth no more and that they have vanished from our mortal sight forever. This thought would be intolerable were it not for the promise of immortality, which, like a bright star of hope, lights life's journey through the years down to the grave.

And though the dead may have passed from our mortal vision forever, and the busy scenes of their labors will know them no more, yet the human heart, torn by sorrow and distress, in the supreme moment of desolation is comforted and consoled by the Divine assurance that "He doeth all things well," for—

There is no death; we fall asleep
To waken where they never weep;
We close our eyes on pain and sin;
Our breath ebbs out, but life flows in.

Mr. DUPRE. Mr. Speaker, SAMUEL DOUGLAS McENERY is dead, and a leader in Israel has fallen. Not a leader in any State or sectional sense—though his life story is inseparably interwoven with the history of Louisiana for the last 40 years and though he typified in the simplicity and integrity of his private life and in the independence and fidelity of his public career the best traditions of the South—but a leader in a large and national sense, for in his 13 years of service in the Senate of the United States it fell to him to cast the deciding vote on some of the most important measures from an economic and governmental standpoint that have arisen since the Civil War.

I shall not, in view of the numerous addresses that have already been made, review in detail his long and eventful career. As a midshipman in the United States Navy, as a soldier in the Army of the Confederacy, as the leader of an outraged people in their revolt from the domination of aliens of his race and their less guilty followers of an inferior race, as lieutenant governor, as governor, as a justice of the supreme court, and as a Senator of the United States he was true to every trust reposed in him, discharging every duty with a devotion borir of an unalloyed patriotism and a capacity derived from a high order of intelligence. Like Oliver Goldsmith, "he touched nothing that he did not adorn."

His public life can be divided into four eras: His heroic struggle for white supremacy in reconstruction days, his tenure as chief executive for seven years, his judicial service for eight years, and his senatorial service from 1897 to the day of his death.

I could only speak of the first from hearsay, so I shall not dwell on those troublous times, but no history of Louisiana will ever be complete without recounting the deeds of that gallant band known as the White Camelias, who at the cost of such tragedies as the Monroe and Colfax riots restored the white race to control of north Louisiana.

Of them all none more bravely or more loyally fought the good fight than did SAMUEL DOUGLAS McENERY, and to the very last there were thousands of men in that great section of our State who, recalling the part he played in reconstruction times, rallied enthusiastically to his support whenever he was a candidate, without regard to local problems or however much they disagreed with his attitude on national questions.

His gubernatorial service will be best and longest remembered because in his administrations the foundation of a rehabilitated public-school system was laid, broad and deep enough to sustain the magnificent one that now prevails in Louisiana, and even more, because as during his term our State suffered the most disastrous overflow in its history, so with him as chief executive was enacted the first legislation that created the present levee board system, which through the union of local taxation and Government aid has given us of the Pelican State the same feeling of security which the Hollanders feel behind their dikes.

I sometimes think that his judicial career was the most remarkable and noteworthy of his public life. Trained at Annapolis for the Navy, it is true that he had studied law at the University of Virginia and at the National Law School, at Poughkeepsie, and had, during the storm and stress of reconstruction times, practiced his profession, but he had never held judicial office and had for more than a decade been engaged with the duties of lieutenant governor and governor when he was appointed to the supreme bench in 1888. He gave the greatest satisfaction in that capacity. As a member of the Louisiana bar, I make so bold as to say that his decisions will stand comparison with those of our best jurists; they are characterized by an admirable grasp of the salient facts, by a thorough knowledge of the record, by an unusual display of common sense, and by an informing sympathy with the great basic principles of the law, and by a terseness and vividness of expression that can not but arrest the reader.

He came to the Senate just before the Dingley bill was under discussion, at a time when the two great parties were very evenly balanced in that body. If I mistake not, his was the pivotal vote that made possible the passage of the Dingley bill. A Democrat, he paid no heed to party platform or the action of his Democratic colleagues, doing that which he believed best for the interests of his State.

Soon after the Spanish War came on, and the treaty of Paris, with annexation of Porto Rico and "benevolent assimilation" of the Philippines, was presented to the Senate for ratification. Again his vote was the deciding one, and it was cast against his party associates, for ratification, and for the right as he saw it. The McEnery resolution declaring the policy of this Government with regard to our insular possessions will ever live in history. Again, in the last tariff legislation he was a conspicuous figure, voting, as he had announced on the hustings and to the General Assembly of Louisiana, that had unanimously elected him, for the best interests of Louisiana as he understood them, regardless of party tenets. SAMUEL DOUGLAS McENERY is the only man in Louisiana who could have pursued such a course and continued to retain the official confidence and support of his people.

Mr. Speaker, Senator McENERY possessed in a remarkable degree the faculty of making and holding friends. He seemed to emerge from a political defeat stronger than before his entrance into the contest, maintaining the enthusiastic devotion of his followers and obtaining the good will and respect of his opponents. For instance, he was defeated by Gen. Francis Tillou Nicholls for the Democratic nomination for governor in 1888, and within a short time thereafter was appointed by Gov. Nicholls, his recent antagonist, to the supreme bench. Gov. Nicholls himself in 1892 became chief justice of the supreme court of our State, and I have it from his own lips that he and Senator McENERY grew in the daily association of the consultation room to be closed personal friends. Again in 1892 Senator McENERY was defeated for the Democratic nomination for governor by the present senior Senator from Louisiana, MURPHY J. FOSTER. Within four years it came to pass that SAMUEL DOUGLAS McENERY was, with the approval of his former political foe, Gov. FOSTER, elected to the United States Senate, a position for which he was not a candidate and which came to him absolutely unsolicited. Only a week ago I listened in the Senate Chamber to the eulogy delivered by Senator FOSTER on his former colleague and heard him testify to the intimate cordiality of their relations in the Senate and to the deep affection which he came to feel for his former opponent. It only needed association and closer acquaintance with Senator McENERY to learn to love him.

Senator McENERY was in public life from 1877 to 1910. He was often engaged in fierce factional conflicts, but never did the breath of suspicion attach to his personal character or his official rectitude. After a lifetime spent in the public service he died poor, but I violate no professional confidence when I state that if he left behind him but little of this world's goods he died owing no man a penny. Knowing him as I did, it has often struck me that Robert Louis Stevenson, the well beloved, might have had him in mind when writing those memorable lines in his Christmas sermon defining the chart of true manhood:

To be honest; to be kind; to earn a little and to spend a little less; to make, upon the whole, a family happier for his presence; to be able to renounce when that shall be necessary, but without embitterment; to have a few friends, but these without capitulation, and on the same grim condition to keep friends with one's self—here is a task for all that a man has of fortitude and delicacy.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Speaker, on June 28, 1910, SAMUEL DOUGLAS McENERY, a Senator of the United States from Louisiana, died. To those looking for a true story of the life and character of a public man it might be said: "Wait till death shall still the lips of prejudice and bias." For every man, especially if he be prominent in national life, has some enemies undeserved or some friends, so-called, whose amicable relations toward him may be due to favors received or expected at his hands.

Again it may be said with some measure of truth that fulsome eulogies pronounced soon after death, before the grass has yet grown green above the grave, are too reactionary to be truthful and are more the result of a desire to speak well of one who was but yesterday a living, sentient being by our side than to hold a mirror up to reality. Hence to write a true biography perhaps a generation should pass after the death of the subject before a Boswell or a Lockhart should take up his pen. It is a question whether, after all, either he who knew one of his fellow men intimately and loved him as a friend or he who was a contemporary of the departed one and held him as an enemy is qualified to mold posterity's opinion of any great character in history.

The truth can never come from the putrid lips of prejudice nor emanate from the inane utterance of the fawning flatterer.

But I leave these comments as not altogether germane, since we are here to-day not for the purpose of attempting biography, nor to attempt to assume the rôle of a Boswell or a Lockhart, but as those who were his fellow legislators, to pay simple and humble tribute to the memory of him whom we knew well. And yet, while we come as friends who knew him well and loved him sincerely for his many good qualities of mind and heart, I for one realize that to overestimate the renown of him whose death we mourn to-day would add no particle of solace to the loved ones left behind.

It would not be his wish, if across the "great divide," he could communicate with us here; for no characteristic was more firmly impressed upon even the most casual acquaintance of Senator MCENERY than his intense and sincere modesty and his scorn for and hatred of flattery.

He was a man who "would not flatter Neptune for his trident nor Jove for his power to thunder;" and bearing such motto upon his shield he would not willingly, nor without protest, suffer himself to hear concerning himself that which he was too manly to say to another.

With this most characteristic element in his nature firmly impressed upon my memory, I shall respect that attribute of our friend, dead, just as I even refrained from transgressing his will in that particular while he lived.

In speaking of SAMUEL DOUGLAS MCENERY, I do not claim for him a place in our history above other great men who have preceded him to the great unknown. I realize full well that this Nation has in its life during which four generations have passed, produced brilliant sons, great statesmen, and warriors renowned, while the Old World has in its march on down through the centuries passed, given birth to her share of the great.

The pen of a Herndon or of a Weems may not give to posterity the story of his career; the brush of a Trumbull or Meissonier may not hand down to those of the aftermath a canvas preserving the epochs of his life; and historians may pass his tomb without turning to gaze at the name inscribed thereon.

Yea, upon the stage of our Nation's life there may have been actors of more note, upon whom the calcium light glittered and shimmered in more brilliant rays; but never in all our national life did one hold a great office of trust, whose form inclosed a truer, nobler heart which throbbed with a purer desire to do the right in public life as God gave him to see it, than the dead man. Never was there a more generous foe, nor a more loyal friend.

From his birth at Monroe, La., May 28, 1837, to his death on June 28, 1910, his career was made up of many marked and thrilling events. I shall not attempt to detail at great length his life story, nor the many places of honor and trust which he held.

Born of Irish ancestry, educated at Spring Hill College, Ala., the United States Naval Academy, the University of Virginia, and at an eastern law school, his mind was broadened in early youth and manhood by association with those who came from all parts of the Nation.

His ardent espousal of the cause of his State in 1861 and his brave and gallant services in the Confederate Army were in keeping with his whole life, for he loved Louisiana above all else, and where she went he followed, as Ruth did Naomi.

A private citizen after 1865 for a decade or more, lieutenant governor of his State in 1879, its governor from 1881 to 1888, justice of the supreme court of Louisiana, 1888 to 1897, and a United States Senator from that time to the date of his death, being three times elected to that great body, all proclaim the great esteem in which he was held by his people and their undying confidence in him.

Soldier, lawyer, governor, jurist, and Senator of the United States, he served his people well, and they, in turn, denied him nothing. Sequently new honors came upon him during almost a generation, yet he was "no petted sprig of Norman blood, rocked and dandled into office." From earliest manhood his people had his love and respect and he their confidence and admiration, and to the end SAMUEL DOUGLAS MCENERY never lost the former feeling for them, nor his people the latter for him.

The honors he received at their hands came to him in almost every instance unsolicited. Within 24 hours after he permitted the use of his name as a candidate at the earnest solicitation of the leaders of his party he was chosen by the caucus as the Democratic nominee for the United States Senate in 1896 and elected soon after, and never afterwards had opposition.

His political career began, we might say, in 1856, when but a lad of 18 years, while at home on vacation from college, he took an active part on the stump in behalf of the Democratic candidate for governor against the Know Nothing, or American, Party, and contributed in no small degree to the success of the former; for notwithstanding his extreme youth he early evinced the capacity for grasping public questions and of expressing himself forcefully, effectively, and with forensic ability. These facts I learned from the lips of one who was the chief beneficiary of his loyal and effective support in that election. The secretiveness, the narrowness, the un-American ideas and doctrines of the Know Nothing Party were abhorrent to his open and frank nature and to his liberal ideas of the rights of his fellow men.

His ability as a lawyer was well known, and when the Federal Investigating Committee of the United States Senate was sent to Louisiana in 1876 to investigate the election of that great and patriotic man, Francis T. Nicholls, as governor of Louisiana, Edward D. White (now Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of our Nation), Ernest Benjamin Krutschmitt (a nephew of Judah P. Benjamin), and SAMUEL D. MCENERY presented the cause of the Democratic Party, and so well and so ably did they perform this service that the Federal Government refused to further interfere in the politics of the State, and the beginning of the end of negro rule in Louisiana was at hand.

The reconstruction period in Louisiana and the South! No voice nor word painting of man has ever yet fully bespoken its terrors; no brush of artist can or has every portrayed its horrors; and not even the masterful pen of Thomas Dixon has adequately described that reign of license and lust for loot by carpetbag government which pervaded the State legislative halls in the later sixties and early seventies nor given complete description of the black pall which covered the corpse of the Confederacy.

Yet amid it all there arose figures—dauntless, unconquerable, unafraid, unmovable—who "played hide and seek with death" or incarceration in a felon's cell that the land of Washington, of Jefferson, and of Jackson might be preserved to the Caucasian race. And in this group, among those who stood in the forefront to save his State from the horrors of murder, rapine, and plunder at the joint hands of African and carpetbagger, SAMUEL D. MCENERY risked life, liberty, property, all.

To him resistance to negro domination was as obedience to God, and on this question there was no compromise with him.

In later years of his service in the Senate Senator MCENERY was afflicted with deafness, which, while ordinarily a great handicap to most men, yet with him it caused no cessation in his labors, for, unable to hear the proceedings in the Senate, he read the RECORD carefully each day, and was better posted on matters transpiring in Congress than many of the Members who were not so afflicted.

Such was his work, while chief executive of his State, for the redemption from overflow of her fertile lands that he takes his place in the history of Louisiana and in the traditions of her people as the beloved "levee governor," by which title he is now and always will be remembered.

Stephen Montague said:

> To know how a bad man will act when in power, reverse all the doctrines he preached when obscure.

Here was a man who always, before being chosen to any office even, declared his position on all questions, and lived up to those declarations when power was bestowed upon him.

As an evidence of his frankness and love of the open, it is recalled that before being chosen by the Democratic Party caucus as its nominee for the Senate in 1896, he declared in an address to the members of that caucus his differences with the National Democracy on the tariff question, and, frankly avowing his faith and belief in the theory of protection, stated that he took his place by the side of Samuel J. Randall, and hence, while at variance often with most of his State delegation in Congress, it can never be said that in voting for that doctrine consistently throughout his years of service in the Senate he in any manner deceived his people, who so often repeatedly elected him to the United States Senate.

There were those in Louisiana who agreed with him on this question, and while a vast number did not, yet such was the nobility of his character and his sincerity of purpose that the latter class forgot this difference for many other issues on which there was perfect accord between him and them.

His honesty was his pride, and the slightest stain upon his reputation for probity, if believed by his people, would have tortured him like the shirt of Nessus. Of criticism by his friends he was duly sensitive; but the calumniator and muck raker who sought to impugn his motives and to destroy his reputation for honesty was ever answered simply by his dignified silence, knowing full well that his people trusted him always and believed him honest. He was ever fond of quoting what Gayarré handed down as emanating from the first American governor of Louisiana, W. C. C. Claiborne:

The lie of the day gives me no concern. Neglected calumny soon expires. Notice it, and you gratify your calumniators; prosecute it, and it acquires consequence; punish it, and you enlist in its favor the public sympathy.

In Senator McEnery were the precepts of true justice so defined by Justinian, that constant and perpetual disposition to render every man his due. He never made a promise but that he kept it; never was a trust reposed in him that he betrayed. The Delphic Oracle had no standing among his ideals, and double tongue was never a subterfuge of this frank, bold man.

As a companion Senator McEnery was to the last most attractive. Many an evening have I visited him in the modest quarters where he resided in Washington, and after dinner, while enjoying a cigar, he frequently became reminiscent. And gazing into "that world of memory in which the distant seems to grow clear and the near to fade," he loved to speak of antebellum days in Louisiana and was most entertaining upon that subject, while few if any could recite or depict more vividly the true history of reconstruction. Seldom did he wish to dwell much upon matters that did not pertain to Louisiana, her people, and what had happened or was still happening there; and not in the sad sense which Scott intended, but as an emblem of the State he loved, his heart found solace in the literal meaning of the words:

Oh, lady, twine no wreath for me,
Or twine if of the cypress tree.

Truly he was Louisiana's "grand old man." We loved Senator McEnery living; we mourn him dead. We regarded him with that devotion which Cicero so loved to laud in "De Amicitia"—friendship, exalted friendship, the love of man for man. Hosts of Louisianians there are still loving him for the memories of long ago when in the pride of his young manhood, and more who knew and revered him in the grandeur of his old age, and who now, that he dwells in the land "beyond the turmoil of renown," shall revere him as one who while he stopped here made the world better for his stay. His name will not perish in the grave of his body.

A soldier, but "one who never turned his back to an enemy, and who knelt to none save God;" a citizen whose services to his people in the dark era of the seventies will not yield in splendor to those of N. B. Forrest; a governor whose administration took up the cord of prosperity where broken and put asunder for two decades, and united the ends in lasting strength; a justice of the supreme court of his State who held the scales so evenly as to demonstrate to all that his sole motive was that justice be done, the united interest of the people preserved, and confidence in the court maintained, until the motto of Louisiana was not more a guide for him than he for it; a Senator of the United States whose three terms of service saw him as faithful to his people on the morning of June 28, 1910, as the youth of 18 in 1856 and the soldier of 23 in 1861. From the beginning to the end he served well.

If the Father deigns to touch with divine power the cold and pulseless heart of the buried acorn and makes it burst forth from its prison walls, will He leave negligent the soul of man who was made in the image of His Creator? If He stoops to give to the rosebush, whose withered blossoms float upon the autumn breeze, the sweet assurance of another springtime, will He withhold the words of hope from the souls of men when the frosts of winter come? If matter, mute and inanimate, though changed by the force of nature into a multitude of forms, can never die, will the spirit of man suffer annihilation after it has paid a brief visit like a royal guest to this tenement of clay? Rather let us believe that He, who wastes not the raindrop, the blade of grass, nor the evening's sighing zephyr, but makes them all to carry out His eternal plans, has given immortality to the mortal and gathered to himself the generous spirit of our friend.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In accordance with the resolutions heretofore adopted, as a further mark of respect to the late Senator Dolliver and the late Senator McEnery, the House will adjourn.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, February 27, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 27, 1911.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CUMMINS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The Secretary will continue the reading of the Journal.

The reading of the Journal was resumed.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he has heard read that part of the Journal he desired to hear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. CUMMINS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa objects.

Mr. KEAN. I thought perhaps the Senator had heard read that part of the Journal he was interested in.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very much interested in every part of the Journal this morning. I hope the Secretary will read every word of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the Journal.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Journal as read will stand approved.

DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, transmitting, pursuant to law, the Thirteenth Annual Report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REGENT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives for the return to that body of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 145) providing for the filling of a vacancy, which will occur on March 1, 1911, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

Mr. LODGE. In this connection I offer the following resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 373) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to inform the House of Representatives that the enrolled Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 145) providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur on March 1, 1911, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress is now and was in the possession of the House when the House requested its return on the 24th of February, having been delivered to the House on the 23d of February and signed by the Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 32909) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also transmitted to the Senate resolutions commemorative of the life and public services of Hon. Jonathan P. Dolliver, late a Senator from the State of Iowa.

The message further transmitted to the Senate resolutions commemorative of the life and public services of Hon. Samuel D. McEnery, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 10691. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 10849. An act to authorize the city of Shreveport to construct a bridge across Red River.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT WATERTOWN, ILL.

Mr. CULLOM. On Saturday I undertook to have a little bill passed to which there is no objection, but I failed to get the proper number. I ask the Senate now to put on its passage the bill (H. R. 32440) authorizing the Moline, East Moline & Watertown Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the south branch of the Mississippi River from a point in the village of Watertown, Rock Island County, Ill., to the island known as Campbells Island. It is very brief.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OUACHITA RIVER BRIDGE, ARKANSAS.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 10882) to authorize the county of Ouachita, Ark., to construct a bridge across Ouachita River.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 28215) to fix the time of holding the circuit and district courts for the northern district of West Virginia.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator whether this has been included in the Judiciary Title which is now in conference. If it has, there is no occasion for the enactment of a law in regard to it. I called upon the Senators to hand in any memorandum with reference to a change of the existing times and places of holding courts, and I assume it was handed in.

Mr. SCOTT. No; I think not. This is a House bill reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator will find it in the Judiciary Title.

Mr. SCOTT. I think not.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not object.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 25.

Whereas it has come to the notice of the Legislature of the State of Kansas that a measure is pending before the Congress of the United States which aims at the removal of 17 United States pension agencies from their present locations throughout the country to the city of Washington, D. C.; and

Whereas these pension agencies were established years ago for the convenience and accommodation of then only 232,000 pensioners of the United States; and

Whereas the number of pensioners has since that time increased to nearly 1,000,000 (being 921,083 June 30, 1910); and

Whereas this legislature is informed that all of the pensioners of the United States are vigorously protesting against this proposed centralization, consolidation, and removal to Washington, D. C., of these 17 pension agencies as inimical to their interests and convenience: It is therefore

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Kansas respectfully asks the Congress of the United States to refuse to enact such a measure, being fully convinced that the system at present in use, to which all pensioners have now become accustomed, will better subserve the interests of the vast body of pensioners, who, owing to their services to the country, as well as to their advanced age, are certainly entitled to consideration of their views and wishes on a measure that so vitally affects them.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the secretary of state to the Senate of the United States and to the House of Representatives of the United States and to each of the Senators and Representatives from this State.

I hereby certify that the above concurrent resolution originated in the house, and passed that body February 20, 1911.

G. H. BUCKMAN, Speaker of the House.
EARL AKERS, Chief Clerk of the House.

Passed the Senate February 23, 1911.

RICHARD J. HOPKINS,
President of the Senate.
F. W. BRINKERHOFF,
Assistant Secretary of the Senate.

Approved February 24, 1911.

W. R. STUBBS, Governor.

STATE OF KANSAS,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, Charles H. Sessions, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the hereto attached is a true copy of House concurrent resolution No. 25, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed my official seal.

Done at the city of Topeka this 24th day of February, A. D. 1911.

[SEAL.] CHAS. H. SESSIONS,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Waterbury Felt Co., of Skaneatekes Falls, N. Y., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal agreement between the United States and Canada, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of San Antonio, Tex., remonstrating against the United States taking any part in the so-called Mexican revolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRYE presented memorials of Westostogo Grange, of North Yarmouth; of Local Grange of Farmington; of Floral Grange, of North Bucksport; of Local Grange of Fort Fairfield; of Silver Lake Grange, of China; and of Local Grange of Wayne, all of the Patrons of Husbandry; and of 1,200 employees of the paper and pulp mills of Livermore Falls, Chisholm, and Riley, all in the State of Maine, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal agreement between the United States and Canada, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Conservation of National Resources.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was read and referred to the Committee on Conservation of National Resources, as follows:

Senate joint memorial No. 5.

Memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact such legislation relative to the several subjects of conservation as shall remove the present existing hindrances to the proper progress and development of the West.

Be it resolved by the senate of the State of Wyoming (the house of representatives of said State concurring):

Whereas there is a great diversity of natural resources in the country lying west of the Missouri River, and there exists numerous varying natural conditions affecting the proper development of these resources by reason of which general blanket statutes and departmental rules can not be applied without resulting in great detriment to the development and hardship and injustice to the denizen and developer of the West, such varying conditions existing even within State boundaries, and which conditions are and can only be understood by the actual residents and workers within the particular territory by nature so conditioned; and

Whereas a vast territory has been segregated and set aside as forest reserves upon which no tree ever grew or ever will or can be grown, and unreasonable departmental rules promulgated and enforced relative thereto whereby a vast acreage of grazing and agricultural land is rendered valueless for home building and the production of meats and wool, destructive fires being the natural result of the unutilized grasses of these reserves, said fires would be prevented by the passage of these lands into private ownership; and

Whereas by reason of the indiscriminating departmental rules the homesteader, prospector, and developer are practically, and often entirely and in fact, debarred from prosecuting his proper, worthy, and useful occupation for the benefit of himself, the community, and posterity; and

Whereas under the present conditions, existing by reason of the recent conservation withdrawals of oil, coal, and other lands and power sites, all development and even use of these resources for the benefit of this section and the country at large is practically precluded, and thereby great injustice, loss of money—in many instances financial ruin—and expensive litigation has been forced upon our people; and

Whereas we, the builders of these western Commonwealths, believe in the proper conservation of these nature's resources, but on such lines as will insure their development, their proper, economical, and unmonopolized use now and hereafter: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States is hereby memorialized and requested to enact such legislation as will relieve and correct the errors and mistakes herein set forth, and most earnestly do hereby recommend that all the natural resources in the Western States be given, under proper restrictions and conditions, to the State wherein they are situated, so they may be under the supervision of those on the ground who are experienced in the many and diversified conditions there prevailing, and so they shall not be subjected to the unknowing, unexperienced, and uninterested control of those living at a distance from the scene of action, or who are sent here as agents without knowledge of their supposed sphere of action; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to send a copy of this memorial to each of our Representatives in Congress.

Approved February 18, 1911.

STATE OF WYOMING,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Wyoming, ss:

I, Frank L. Houx, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed has been carefully compared with senate joint memorial 5 on file in this office, and is a full, true, and correct copy of the same and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 24th day of February, A. D. 1911.

[SEAL.] FRANK L. HOUX, Secretary of State,
By C. P. MACGLASHAN, Deputy.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial No. 4.

Memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, requesting Congress to pass the Mondell bill, providing for a parcels post on the rural and star routes of the United States.

Be it resolved by the senate of the State of Wyoming (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized as follows:

Whereas the people of the State of Wyoming are sorely in need of quicker, cheaper, and more adequate transportation facilities, whereby they can receive and transmit small packages over the rural and star routes; and

Whereas the Mondell bill, now pending before the Congress of the United States, whereby parcels up to 11 pounds may be transmitted over said routes for the sum of 25 cents per package, thus offering greatly increased accommodations to our people, appears to promise just the relief desired: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States is hereby earnestly petitioned to pass the said parcels-post bill; and be it further

Resolved, That a certified copy of this memorial be sent to the United States Senators and Representative in Congress from Wyoming.

Approved February 18, 1911.

STATE OF WYOMING,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Wyoming, ss:

I, Frank L. Houx, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed has been carefully compared with senate joint memorial No. 4 filed in this office, and is a full, true, and correct copy of the same and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 24th day of February, A. D. 1911.

[SEAL.] FRANK L. HOUX, Secretary of State,
By C. P. MACGLASHAN, Deputy.

Mr. McCUMBER. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Twelfth Legislative Assembly, State of North Dakota—Concurrent resolution, introduced by Mr. Bessesen.

Whereas about 90 per cent of the grain handled at terminals is interstate; and

Whereas it is an injustice for any one State, by reason of its having terminal points within its borders, to exercise the absolute power of inspection over the grains of the numerous grain-growing States which regularly ship all the grain to its terminals; and

Whereas the shipping of grain is in reality interstate commerce and the inspection thereof should be controlled by the Federal Government, so as to give more absolute justice and equality to all and so as to result in the least discrimination against any particular State or locality; and

Whereas the Federal inspection of meats and foods has resulted in unformity and far-reaching benefit to the people of this country; and

Whereas the interests of the State of North Dakota are agricultural and its chief source of wealth is its grain crop; and

Whereas the grain crop is annually shipped through the terminals of other States and is dependent for its grading and inspection upon the laws of other States; and

Whereas it is apparent that the highest degree of efficiency and uniformity in grain grading and inspection can be attained only under Federal supervision; and

Whereas a concurrent resolution for an amendment to the constitution of this State providing for the erection, leasing, purchase, and operating of terminal elevators in the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin has passed the legislative assembly of 1909, and is again before this assembly for passage; and

Whereas in order to make it effective in the highest degree a Federal law providing for Federal inspection of grains is desirable: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the senate of the State of North Dakota (the house of representatives concurring), That this legislative assembly puts itself on record in favor of a just system of Federal inspection of grains, and that the early passage by the Congress of the United States of a Federal law for the Federal inspection of grains is urged and earnestly recommended, and that our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested and urged to work and vote for the speedy passage of such a bill in Congress providing for such Federal inspection of grain; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forthwith sent to each of our United States Senators and Representatives in Congress.

This certifies that the foregoing concurrent resolution originated in the senate and was concurred in by the house of representatives of the Twelfth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota.

MOHER L. BURDICK,
President of the Senate.
JAS. M. HANLEY,
Speaker of the House.

Mr. BRIGGS presented memorials of Rancocas Grange, Somerset Grange, Mercer Grange, Lincoln Grange, Bridgeport Grange, Blue Anchor Grange, Franklin Grange, and of the New Jersey State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry; John A. McBride, of the board of managers of the State Hospital, Morris Plains; and of sundry citizens of Hamilton Square, all in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal agreement between the United States and Canada, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Hackensack, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the Hat Finishers' Union of Newark, N. J., praying for the construction of all United States battleships in Government navy yards, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Edward D. Fox, of Trenton, N. J., and the petition of Joe Hooker Post, Department of New Jersey, Grand Army of the Republic, of Atlantic City, N. J., praying for the passage of the so-called old-age pension bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. OWEN. I present a concurrent resolution of the State of Oklahoma, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 34.

Whereas section 3, article 16, of the constitution of Oklahoma authorizes the legislature to provide for a system of levees and drains in the State; and

Whereas owing to the legislation upon the alienation or incumbrance of land owned by members of the Five Civilized Tribes, in many sections which should be embraced in levy or drainage districts, it is impossible to organize such districts; and

Whereas thousands of acres of the most fertile lands lying in the east side of the State are, for the reasons above set forth, now nonproductive, which would, if properly protected by levees or drainage, produce annually thousands of dollars of wealth and would greatly enhance in value, thus materially benefiting the owners of such lands and the entire country: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house and senate of the Oklahoma Legislature, That Congress be, and is hereby, memorialized to grant such relief to such districts at the earliest possible date by adequate legislation as will empower the members of the Indian tribes owning lands in districts subject to levee and drainage to participate in the formation of such districts and the issuance of bonds as provided by the laws of the State of Oklahoma, to the end that justice may be done the owners of said lands, and that thousands of acres of our best lands, which are now nonproductive, may be converted into happy, prosperous homes, and that said lands may contribute their share to the support and welfare of the entire country; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be immediately forwarded to each of the United States Senators and Representatives in Congress from Oklahoma, and that copies be sent to the chambers of commerce of the most important cities in the neighboring States, with a request that they urge their Representatives in Congress to aid in procuring the relief herein prayed for.

Passed the house of representatives February 16, 1911.

W. A. DURANT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Passed the senate February 16, 1911.

J. ELMER THOMAS,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 20.

Whereas a bill (H. R. 29346) known as the Sulloway bill, granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico, has passed the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States and is now pending in the Senate: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate of the State of Oklahoma (the house of representatives concurring therein):

1. That we heartily approve all the provisions of said bill, and that we hereby respectfully request our Senators in Congress to vote for and use every honorable means to secure its passage by the Senate of the United States just as it passed the House of Representatives, without alteration or amendments as to benefits provided.

2. That copies of this resolution, signed by the respective officers of both the senate and house, when properly engrossed, be sent each of the Senators from the State of Oklahoma in the Congress of the United States.

Passed by the senate this 16th day of February, 1911.

J. ELMER THOMAS,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Passed by the house of representatives this 17th day of February, 1911.

W. A. DURANT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of the Industrial Club of Cheyenne, Wyo., praying for an increase in the salary of railway mail clerks, and remonstrating against the reported policy in failing to fill vacancies in the railway mail service, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of Carl F. Rakow, of Wheatland, N. Dak., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal agreement between the United States and Canada, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES. I present a large number of telegrams in the nature of memorials, signed by business firms in the State of Washington, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal agreement with Canada. I ask that the first telegram be read.

There being no objection, the Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., February 18, 1911.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington D. C.:

The banking and business interests Seattle deem reciprocity measure of especial menace to Pacific coast industries. Lumber, coal, fish, fruit, shipping, wheat, and Alaska trade seriously jeopardized without any compensating feature from Canada. Lumber valued at $20,000,000 to California yearly jeopardized because of being shipped in American bottoms as against lesser wages in foreign bottoms from Canada. Northwest Canada territory wheat best in world and will seriously compete with Washington. Seattle's Alaska business will be divided with Vancouver and Prince Rupert. Fish business will be diverted to Frazer River and eastern British Columbia. Apples will be diverted to Wenatche, Yakima, and Hood River. British Columbia coal will harm our coal mines. We are simply turning over resources this country to Canada without recompense. Urge you to vote and work against reciprocity; if passage bill imperative it should provide removal duty on Canadian logs and make absolute free trade.

Mr. JONES. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Washington, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial No. 7.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the senate and house of representatives of the State of Washington in legislative session assembled, being the twelfth regular session, respectfully represent in petition as follows:

There are over 300,000 acres of arid land in Benton, Yakima, and Klickitat Counties in the State of Washington, lying in the valley of the Columbia River, and commonly known as the "Horse Heaven" district, which are capable of irrigation. About three-fourths of this land is now held in private ownership and the remainder has been filed upon under the desert-land acts.

The entrymen who have filed on this land under the desert act have done their assessment work and made their annual proofs in good faith, and confidently believe that they could make reclamation and final proof within the limit of time provided by the United States statutes and extension enactments amendatory thereto, but the work of bringing water from the mountains, distant 150 miles, has proven so great that it is now apparent that more time will be required than is now given by law.

Much of this vast district of 300,000 acres or more is valueless without irrigation, and it is now definitely known that irrigation is possible therefor at a reasonable cost. It has often been announced through press reports that the Reclamation Department of the United States Government will pursue a policy of encouragement to private capital in reclaiming arid lands. Most of the projects with water supply comparatively near have already been undertaken, and those in which the water supply is remote can not be financed and canals built within the period given to desert entrymen for making final proof.

Wherefore your memorialists respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to enact a law which shall extend the time in which the desert-land entrymen of the "Horse Heaven" district may make final proof until such time as water may become available to them through an irrigation project now under way for this district.

Passed the house January 25, 1911.

HOWARD D. TAYLOR,
Speaker of the House.

Passed the senate February 14, 1911.

W. H. PAULHAMUS,
President of the Senate.

Mr. JONES presented memorials of sundry citizens of Prosser, Wash.; of Prairie Grange, No. 191; Columbia Pomona Grange, of Clarke County; Sunny Side Grange; Fern Bluff Grange, No. 267, of Sultan; Lincoln Grange, No. 357, of Matlock; Whibby Grange, No. 354, of Island; Happy Valley Grange, No. 322; and Local Grange of Tekoa, all of the Patrons of Husbandry, in the State of Washington, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal agreement between the United States and Canada, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TALIAFERRO presented a petition of sundry citizens of Polk County, Fla., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation donating 300,000 acres of Government land in the Territory of New Mexico to the archbishop of Santa Fe, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BRISTOW. I submit a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 25.

Whereas it has come to the notice of the Legislature of the State of Kansas that a measure is pending before the Congress of the United States which aims at the removal of 17 United States pension agencies from their present locations throughout the country to the city of Washington, D. C.; and

Whereas these pension agencies were established years ago for the convenience and accommodation of then only 232,000 pensioners of the United States; and

Whereas the number of pensioners has since that time increased to nearly 1,000,000 (being 921,083 June 30, 1910); and

Whereas this legislature is informed that all of the pensioners of the United States are vigorously protesting against this proposed centralization, consolidation, and removal to Washington, D. C., of these 17 pension agencies as inimical to their interests and convenience: It is therefore

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Kansas respectfully asks the Congress of the United States to refuse to enact such a measure, being fully convinced that the system at present in use, to which all pensioners have now become accustomed, will better subserve the interests of the vast body of pensioners, who, owing to their services to the country, as well as to their advanced age, are certainly entitled to consideration of their views and wishes on a measure that so vitally affects them.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the secretary of state to the Senate of the United States and to the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from this State.

I hereby certify that the above concurrent resolution originated in the house and passed that body February 20, 1911.

G. H. BUCKMAN, Speaker of the House.
EARL AKERS, Chief Clerk of the House.

Passed the senate February 23, 1911.

RICHARD J. HOPKINS,
President of the Senate.
F. W. BRINKERHOFF,
Assistant Secretary of the Senate.

Approved February 24, 1911.

W. R. STUBBS, Governor.

STATE OF KANSAS,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, Charles H. Sessions, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the hereto attached is a true copy of house concurrent resolution No. 25, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed my official seal.

Done at the city of Topeka this 24th day of February, A. D. 1911.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (65a) asking the Congress of the United States to refuse to enact the measure now pending relating to United States pension agencies.

Whereas it has come to the notice of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin that a measure is pending before the Congress of the United States which aims at the removal of 17 United States pension agencies from their present locations throughout the country to the city of Washington, D. C.; and

Whereas these pension agencies were established years ago for the convenience and accommodation of then only 232,000 pensioners of the United States; and

H. C. MARTIN,
President pro tempore of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. I present resolutions signed by the president and secretary of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of Virginia, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the United States Immigration Commission, after four years investigation involving the expenditure of almost $1,000,000, reports that restriction is demanded by "economic, moral, and social reasons," specifically recommends a reading and writing test, "as the most feasible single method for excluding undesirable immigration," and suggests also an increased head tax, a limitation of numbers, a money qualification, and other measures that are law in other countries and which have been urged by the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America in National and State convention; and

Whereas the United States is the only country with any considerable net foreign immigration, as a result of her feeble immigration laws; and

Whereas it is proposed in order to permit the foreign steamships to bring more and to relieve the Northeast of its immigration evils, that the present enormous annual alien influx of over a million, of whom less than 15,000 last year were "farmers," be diverted and distributed over the agricultural sections, and a Federal Division of Information and Display has been established for accomplishing such purpose: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of Virginia in State convention this 7th day of February, That we earnestly urge upon Congress the immediate passage of H. R. 15413, and such other measures as will give this country some such protection from undesirable immigration as is recommended by the Immigration Commission and is in force in other civilized countries, such as Canada, Australia, and Natal; and be it further

Resolved, That the State secretary send at once a copy of this resolution to the entire Virginia congressional delegation with the request that it be presented to Congress, and to the President, at Washington, D. C.

Passed unanimously and enthusiastically indorse action of legislative committee at Washington last March before the House Committee on Immigration and Scott bill.

D. M. GANNAWAY, President,
H. L. PETTY, Secretary,
Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America.

He also presented petitions of Local Lodge No. 363, International Association of Machinists, of Queen City; of the Central Trades and Labor Council of Cape Girardeau; of Local Union No. 1827, United Mine Workers of America, of Lexington; and of the Sedalia Federation of Labor, all in the State of Missouri, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigation.

He also presented petitions of Journeymen Tailors' Local Union No. 6, of Sedalia; of the Culture Club, of Edina; of the United States History Class, of St. Louis; and of Local Union No. 26, United Garment Workers of America, of St. Louis, all in the State of Missouri, praying for the repeal of the present oleomargarine law, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the establishment of a national department of health, which were referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

He also presented a petition of Colonel Grover Post, No. 78, Department of Missouri, Grand Army of the Republic, of Warrensburg, Mo., and a petition of Captain John Mathews Post, No. 69, Department of Missouri, Grand Army of the Republic, of Springfield, Mo., praying for the passage of the so-called old-age pension bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Schuyler County, Mo., remonstrating against the creation of a Civil War volunteer officers' retired list, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Missouri, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called rural parcels-post bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New Hamburg and Benton, in the State of Missouri, praying for the passage of the so-called parcels-post bill, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WETMORE presented a memorial of Local Grange No. 39, Patrons of Husbandry, of North Scituate, R. I., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal agreement between the United States and Canada, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURNHAM presented memorials of Local Grange No. 156, of Surry; of Hillsborough County Pomona Grange, No. 1, of Bedford; of John Hancock Grange, No. 33, of Hancock; of Mount Prospect Grange, No. 242, of Lancaster; and of Merrimack County Pomona Grange, of North Boscawen, all of the Patrons of Husbandry, in the State of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal agreement between the United States and Canada, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. OWEN. I present the memorial of Moncena Dunn, of La Crosse, Wis., setting forth the coupon ballot as authorized by the laws of Wisconsin. It is an improved method of assuring an honest ballot, which I understand has been adopted by the State of Wisconsin. I move that the memorial be printed as a Senate document (No. 840).

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PENROSE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 10379) to promote the efficiency of the Naval Militia, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BURNHAM, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 10668) to satisfy certain claims against the Government arising under the Navy Department, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1252) thereon.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 32675) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1253) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 32822) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1254) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. MCCUMBER on the 23d instant, proposing to appropriate $1,200 to pay Robert W. Farrar for indexing and extra services as clerk to the Committee on Pensions, Sixty-first Congress, third session, and also to appropriate $1,200 to pay Dennis M. Kerr for services as assistant clerk by detail to the Committee on Pensions, Sixty-first Congress, third session, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2328) to grant an honorable discharge to Alfred L. Dutton, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1255) thereon.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19010) authorizing proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to reopen pay accounts of certain officers of the Navy, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1256) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19685) to compensate William P. Williams for losses sustained by him while assistant treasurer of the United States at Chicago, Ill., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1257) thereon.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 23826) to amend section 13, chapter 252, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes," approved May 28, 1896 (29 Stats. L., p. 183), reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1258) thereon.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 31806) to amend section 1 of the act approved March 2, 1907, being an act to amend an act entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon United States commissioners over offenses committed on a portion of the permanent Hot Springs Mountain Reservation, Ark.," reported it without amendment.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 10863) to give the consent of Congress to the building of a bridge by the city of Northport, Wash., over the Columbia River, at Northport, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1259) thereon.

S. H. ROBINSON.

Mr. OLIVER. From the Committee on Claims I report back favorably the bill (H. R. 18512) for the relief of S. H. Robinson, of Allegheny County, Pa., and I submit a report (No. 1249) thereon. It is the unanimous report of the committee, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to S. H. Robinson, of Allegheny County, Pa., $26,985.63, as compensation for the injury sustained by him because of a flood in the Allegheny River in January, 1907, that being the amount recommended to be paid him by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HACKENSACK RIVER CANAL, NEW JERSEY.

Mr. FRYE. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 10883) authorizing the Erie Railroad Co. to construct a canal connecting the Hackensack River and Berrys Creek, Bergen County, N. J., as an aid to navigation, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 1251) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] to the bill.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEVIATION IN WEIGHT OF SILVER COINS.

Mr. SMOOT. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 24885) to amend section 3536 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the weighing of silver coins, to report it favorably, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks for the immediate consideration of a bill, which the Secretary will read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3536 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3536. In adjusting the weight of the silver coins the following deviations shall not be exceeded in any single piece: In the dollar, the half and quarter dollar, and in the dime, 1½ grains."

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the bill be again reported.

The Secretary again read the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to know the necessity for the porposed legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. I can state it in a very few words, Mr. President. In the present law there is an accepted deviation from the standard weight of 1½ grains in the case of an individual half dollar, an individual dollar, an individual quarter, and an individual 10-cent piece. But in the mints, where the coins are weighed together, there is entirely a different acceptable deviation, and every dime and every quarter and every half and every dollar has to be counted now separately at the mints. This makes the deviation of a grain and a half for all the same, whether it be an individual piece or in bulk.

Mr. HEYBURN. You can not recognize the right of the mint to grow careless in the coinage.

Mr. SMOOT. This has nothing to do with the coinage.

Mr. HEYBURN. Coins in the mint ought to be absolutely true to the weight, and whenever we recognize laxity on the part of the mint we are opening the door to greater carelessness. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will go to the calendar.

NATIONAL DEFENSE SECRETS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 26656) to prevent the disclosure of national defense secrets, to report it favorably, and I submit a report (No. 1250) thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PAYNTER:

A bill (S. 10893) granting a pension to Samuel G Hillis; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CARTER:

A bill (S. 10894) to accept the cession by the State of Montana of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Glacier National Park, and for other purposes (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. FLINT:

A bill (S. 10895) to set apart a certain tract of land in the State of California as a public park, such lands, together with those set aside by the act of September 25, 1890, to be known as Sequoia National Park; to the Committee on Public Lands.

Hanchett, of Grand Rapids, Mich., for money expended for necessary expenses while attending the meetings of the assay commission in March, 1905, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARNER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $30,000 for an electric lighting plant, including the enlargement of the power house, and one new boiler at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, Hot Springs, Ark., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $45,000 for the commencement of the building for the post office at Searcy, Ark., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OVERMAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $210,000 for the purchase of the so-called Carpenter Pennsylvania Avenue tract, in the District of Columbia, for park purposes, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment relative to the salaries of plate printers in the Coast and Geodetic Survey, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. WATSON. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 32216) to promote reciprocal trade relations with Canada, which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the amendment was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. WATSON to the bill H. R. 32216, viz: Insert the following: On page 8 strike out lines 17 and 18, as follows: "Coal slack or culm of all kinds, such as will pass through a half-inch screen, 15 cents per ton." And on page 15, line 19, after the word "screen," strike out the words "45 cents per ton" and insert the words "and coal slack or culm of all kinds, such as will pass through a half-inch screen," and place the same on the free list. So that the amendment will read on page 15, beginning with line 17, as follows:

"Coal, bituminous, round and run of mine, including bituminous coal such as will not pass through a three-quarter-inch screen, and coal slack or culm of all kinds, such as will pass through a half-inch screen, free."

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—LAND IN FORT SMITH, ARK.

On motion of Mr. WARREN, it was Ordered, That all papers accompanying Senate bill No. 10348, Sixty-first Congress, third session, entitled "A bill to convey to the city of Fort Smith, Ark., a portion of the national cemetery reservation in said city," be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made on said bill.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—GEORGE D. BLAKEY.

On motion of Mr. PAYNTER, it was Ordered, That the heirs and representatives of George D. Blakey be, and they are hereby, authorized to withdraw from the files of the Senate all papers relating to and on file in connection with Senate bill 3925, Sixty-first Congress, second session, entitled "A bill for the relief of George D. Blakey," no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADVANCES IN FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 41), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 5,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 725, Sixty-first Congress, third session, be printed, 3,000 for the use of the House of Representatives and 2,000 for the United States Senate.

RATE ADVANCE CASES.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 374), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the rate advance cases known as Docket No. 3400 and Docket No. 3500 be printed as a part of Document No. 725.

LIST OF CLAIMS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 376), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the following schedule and lists of claims, judgments, and awards requiring appropriations by Congress not heretofore reported to Congress at the present session, namely:

First. Schedule of claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874.

Second. List of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims against the United States.

Third. List of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of claimants and against the United States under the act to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations, approved March 3, 1891.

Fourth. List of judgments rendered against the United States by the circuit and district courts of the United States under the act to provide for bringing suits against the Government of the United States, approved March 3, 1887.

Fifth. List of awards made by the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission under the act to carry into effect the stipulations of article 7 of the treaty between the United States and Spain concluded on the 10th day of December, 1898, approved March 2, 1901.

RUSSIA AND THE AMERICAN PASSPORT.

Mr. SHIVELY. I present a paper, being the address of Louis Marshall, on Russia and the American passport, before the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, New York, Thursday, January 19, 1911. I move that the paper be printed as a Senate document (No. 839).

The motion was agreed to.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. McCUMBER. I present a short letter from the Modern Miller, of St. Louis, Mo. There are two paragraphs which I should like to have read, so that they may go into the RECORD, because they are very pertinent in reply to a question which was asked by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the paragraphs, as requested by the Senator from North Dakota.

The Secretary read as follows:

Hon. P. J. McCUMBER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I note the vigorous stand you have taken against Canada reciprocity and the fact that it will discourage wheat culture in the United States and encourage the away-from-the-farm movement to the Canadian fields. As this is apparently, to us, a most unfortunate prospect, I take the liberty of calling your attention to the fact that free wheat can not possibly be a factor of consequence in reducing the cost of living. The annual per capita consumption of flour in the United States is but slightly in excess of one barrel per year. It takes approximately 5 bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour, and if free wheat reduces the cost 10 cents per bushel it would mean an annual saving of 50 cents per barrel of flour to each consumer in the United States. Thus a consumer would receive a reduction of 50 cents per year in the cost of living. There is no getting away from this substantial fact. Furthermore, if a consumer uses bakers' bread, he will not receive one penny's worth of benefit in the reduction of the cost of living, as the little matter of 50 cents per year will be absorbed by the baker.

So far as the question of free wheat reducing the cost of living is concerned, it is beyond the question of a doubt a myth. While the reduction of 10 cents a bushel would mean a material loss to the farmer, but a matter of more consequence is that it would discourage wheat culture in this country and would cause dependence upon Canadian wheat prospects.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will lie on the table.

INCREASED POSTAGE ON SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Mr. PENROSE. I present a number of communications from the Postmaster General relative to the increased rate of postage on second-class mail matter. I move that the communications be printed as a Senate document (No. 841).

The motion was agreed to.

RATES FOR BONDING GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. GALLINGER. From the joint commission of Congress to inquire into the rates of premium heretofore and now being charged, as well as those proposed to be charged, by surety or bonding companies for bonds of officers or employees of the United States, I submit a report (No. 1260) and ask that it be printed and that 200 extra copies be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

There being no objection, the order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 200 additional copies of Senate Report No. 1260, "Rates for bonding Government employees," be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the second committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 29360) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, and recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 99, 100, 101, and 102.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 32440. An act authorizing the Moline, East Moline & Watertown Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the south branch of the Mississippi River from a point in the village of Watertown, Rock Island County, Ill., to the island known as Campbells Island;

H. R. 24153. An act for the relief of John Marshall;

H. R. 23015. An act to protect the dignity and honor of the uniform of the United States; and

H. R. 10430. An act to authorize the establishment of a marine biological station on the Gulf coast of the State of Florida.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States by Mr. Latta, Executive clerk, announced that the President had, on February 25, 1911, approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

S. 8457. An act to restore to the public domain certain lands withdrawn for reservoir purposes in Millard County, Utah; and

S. J. Res. 132. Joint Resolution authorizing the delivering to the commander in chief of the United Spanish War Veterans of one or two dismounted bronze cannon.

GREELEY-ARIZONA IRRIGATION CO.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 10808) to authorize the Greeley-Arizona Irrigation Co. to build a dam across the Colorado River at or near Head Gate Rock, near Parker, in Yuma County, Ariz.

Mr. BURROWS. I think I must object.

Mr. WARREN (to Mr. BURROWS). Let him get that through.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan objects, and the bill will go over.

LANDS OF CERTAIN INDIAN MINORS.

Mr. OWEN. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18893) relating to the title of lands inherited by minor heirs of Indian allottees, and sold by order of court, and for other purposes, to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It merely clears the title to certain pieces of land in western Oklahoma.

Mr. BURROWS. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan asks for the regular order, and the bill will go to the calendar.

HOT SPRINGS MOUNTAIN RESERVATION, ARK.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 31806) to amend section 1 of the act approved March 2, 1907, being an act to amend an act entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon United States commissioners over offenses committed on a portion of the permanent Hot Springs Mountain Reservation, Ark., to report it favorably, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. BURROWS. I must insist upon the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Regular order is demanded, and the bill will go to the calendar.

EMPLOYEES ON PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. CLAPP. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask to have it referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 375), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor be instructed to investigate and make report to the Senate whether or not the circular, No. 315, signed by George E. Goethals, chairman and chief engineer of the construction of the Panama Canal, published in the Canal Record for the month of March, 1910, in its reference to employees who have been discharged from South American railroads, has any application as a prohibition to citizens of the United States applying for employment in Government work on the Isthmus;

And to further inquire whether or not the arrangements and agreements with men employed as locomotive engineers, conductors, steamshovel engineers, and dredgemen on the Panama Canal, made by the Hon. W. H. Taft, when Secretary of War, in relation to compensation for overtime when overtime work was actually necessary, and for longevity pay, has been violated or broken, and whether or not employees who entered upon such work, in reliance upon the arrangements and agreements made with Secretary Taft have been deprived of the benefits of the arrangements and agreements under which they entered upon such work;

And to further inquire if the provision in the act making the appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, prohibiting any part of the appropriation for the Isthmian Canal being applied to the payment for allowance for longevity service on lay-over days other than such as may have accumulated under existing orders of the commission prior to July 1, 1909, is a violation of the understanding, arrangement, and agreement under which the men were employed in constructive and operative work on said canal, and to report whether such prohibition ought to be modified or repealed to effectuate the understanding under which employees entered upon that work.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let the resolution go to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. CLAPP. I asked to have it referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut asks that it go to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Committee on Interoceanic Canals would have jurisdiction of the resolution, as far as I was able to hear it when it was reported.

Mr. CLAPP. It goes to the question whether there has been anything not warranted by law with reference to the employment of men. It clearly should go to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am satisfied with whatever reference the Chair may direct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, unless the Senate directs otherwise, would refer it as the Senator introducing it asked, which was to the Committee on Education and Labor. It is so referred.

BATTLESHIPS FOR ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, coming over from a former day, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 364) submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE on the 22d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate a report on the following matters:

(1) Copies of any and all orders which may have been issued by the Secretary of the Navy or his subordinates and of all communications received or sent by the Navy Department pertaining to the construction in private shipyards of two battleships for the account of the Argentine Republic.

(2) What, if any, plans of guns, gun mounts, and other appliances pertaining to the armament of battleships the property of the Government of the United States in the custody of the Navy Department have been loaned, transmitted, or communicated to either the representative of the Argentine Republic or to representatives of any shipbuilding company?

(3) What, if any, of such plans cover devices which hitherto through patents or secrecy have been the exclusive property of the United States Government?

(4) What, if any, work has been done in the navy yard at Washington or elsewhere by any officials or employees of the Navy Department, civilians or otherwise, to aid in the construction and armament of the two battleships being built in this country for the Argentine Republic?

(5) If any such plans have been so divulged or if such work has been performed by employees of the Navy Department, by whose authority has such action been taken and such work performed?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to be inserted on page 1, line 15, after the word "company."

The SECRETARY. In the second paragraph, in line 15, after the word "company," insert:

Were the plans of the new battleships, Nos. 34 and 35, marked "confidential," furnished to the Argentine Republic? Were the plans of our submarine torpedo tubes and the fire-control system furnished to the Bethlehem Steel Co. or to the Argentine Republic for use in the two battleships now under construction in this country for the account of the Argentine Republic? Has the Argentine Republic or the Bethlehem Steel Co. been furnished with the book or specification marked "confidential," or with any appendices to such book?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have no desire to take the time of the Senate this morning in discussing the resolution, if it can be passed by the Senate as I offered it. I ask for a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I shall have to call for the regular order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am unable to hear the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BURROWS. I say I must demand the regular order at this time. I trust the Senator will be content to have this matter considered later.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from Michigan will not insist on the regular order I think that no time will be taken in the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BURROWS. If it takes no time, I have no objection to it.

Mr. BROWN. The resolution is regularly before the Senate, is it not?

Mr. BURROWS. I have no objection to it if it takes no time.

Mr. BROWN. Let it be proceeded with.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the regular order. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that Senate resolution 365 be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 365, submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE on the 22d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of any written communications and report upon any verbal communications which may have passed between the State Department and any other department of the Government of the United States, or between the State Department and any department or representative of the Argentine Republic, and any other communications, written or verbal, which may have been issued or received by the State Department pertaining to the construction and armament in this country of two battleships for the Argentine Republic.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. KEAN. That is a very unusual resolution. I do not think there is any precedent anywhere for a resolution of that kind.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The occasion for the resolution is very unusual.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take the time of the Senate to discuss the resolution. I ask that it be submitted to a vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the resolution be read again.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest to the Senator that he should insert the words "if not incompatible with the public interest." This seems to be dealing with a foreign government.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, ordinarily I should readily assent to that. When that same suggestion was made the morning I introduced the resolution, the suggestion coming from the Senator from New Jersey at that time, the Senator from New Hampshire at once said that under the circumstances the phraseology of the resolution was exactly right. His long service upon the Committee on Naval Affairs gives special weight to his opinion in the matter. It was my own opinion. It was for that reason that I so framed the resolution, without including the usual qualifying statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not recall the circumstance the Senator alludes to. I do not recollect having made that statement.

Mr. KEAN. It was the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. GALLINGER. It was the Senator from Maine, I think.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was the Senator from Maine.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator will see that no harm can come if this phrase is used. It seems to be dealing with a foreign government.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is dealing with a foreign government, and if there is any occasion for requiring a report under the resolution at all it is because department officials have not been considerate of the best interests of the public or of this Government. I do not think that under the circumstances, considering the nature and character of the resolution, anything should be left to the discretion of the departmental officials in this particular case.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire proposes the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Senate," in line 2, insert the words "if not incompatible with the public interest."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the departmental officials of either of the departments referred to, the one named in the resolution which was passed and the one named in the resolution which is pending, have disclosed to any foreign government or the agents of any foreign government any confidential documents or any documents treated or marked as confidential in the Department of the Navy, they have manifestly shown such a want of consideration of the public interest that it should not be left to them to judge whether this resolution calls for information which is incompatible with the public interest.

The ordinary plans of battleships, Mr. President, are not confidential, and there is no reason why they should be; but there are many things in the construction of a battleship which I am credibly informed, and which one can readily see is reasonable, should be treated strictly as confidential and should not be communicated to any shipbuilder unless he is employed upon the construction of some battleship for our own Government—and then only in the strictest confidence.

Now, Mr. President, that is all I care to say upon the matter at this time. I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator demand the yeas and nays or a division?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], and I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. FOSTER. I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—44.

So Mr. GALLINGER's amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BURROWS obtained the floor.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BURROWS. I am advised that several Senators are prepared to proceed with the consideration of Senate resolution 315. We have three-quarters of an hour before 2 o'clock, and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to appear to be ungracious, but I am very deeply interested in a measure pending now before the Senate, and my people are very deeply interested in it. The only opportunity there seems now to be to consider it is to pursue the regular order. I refer to the tariff commisssion bill. I feel, therefore, that I must object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BURROWS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, Senate resolution 315.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. KEAN. The question is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable. Does the Senator from Iowa rise to a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. My parliamentary inquiry is this: Is the motion made by the Senator from Michigan in order at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair it is.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it is in order at this time, is it not debatable if made before 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair it is not.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURROWS. For a question.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the motion carries, will there be an opportunity to discuss the matter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will be.

Mr. BURROWS. The very object is to open debate on the proposition.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But I was informed that if the motion was carried that we are not even then to have the privilege of discussion.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is being proceeded with, which is the motion of the Senator from Michigan to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 315. That motion is neither debatable nor amendable. If the Senate decides to proceed to the consideration of the matter, it is then open for full and free debate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington rises to a parliamentary inquiry. He will state it.

Mr. JONES. Would it be in order to amend the motion of the Senator from Michigan by substituting another bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not in order to amend the motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon the motion of the Senator from Michigan I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Can a motion to proceed to the consideration of a matter by the Senate be made before 2 o'clock? I have no objection to this motion, having voted "yea."

Mr. KEAN. The roll having been called, let us have the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was decided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. FRYE (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. FRYE. I have a general pair with that Senator, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 66, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—66.

Bailey	Dick	Martin	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Dillingham	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Beveridge	Dixon	Nixon	Smith, S. C.

So the motion of Mr. BURROWS was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 315, submitted by Mr. BEVERIDGE January 9, 1911, as follows:

Resolved, That WILLIAM LORIMER was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Illinois.

Mr. CRAWFORD obtained the floor.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. STONE. I desire to make an announcement. I desire to say that on Wednesday morning next after the conclusion of the morning business I shall proceed to address the Senate on what is known as the Lorimer resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The notice will be entered.

Mr. CRAWFORD addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, in order to avoid any question as to the parliamentary status, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 315, relative to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, a Senator from the State of Illinois.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just for a moment. I wish to point out to the Chair at the present moment the unparliamentary status which the Senate has found itself in for the last half hour. We have now been considering for the last half hour, in the morning hour, the unfinished business.

At a later time, not now, I shall call the attention of the Senate to that, because I do not think—I may be wrong—that the motion can be entertained in the morning hour. I am familiar with the rule. The present condition very plainly illustrates that we have been considering the unfinished business under a separate motion for the last 30 minutes. I do not want to take time to do it now, but for the purpose of showing that my inquiry as to that was not vain, I shall lay perhaps two or three authorities before the Senate later on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that no point of order was made against the motion when it was made.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana attempted to interpose a point of order at the time the roll was being called and the Chair could not entertain it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; the Chair will permit the Senator from Indiana to suggest a correction; I did not interpose a point of order; I would not have done that; I voted for the motion. I rose to a parliamentary inquiry.

Sometimes in our haste—I have seen it in many matters here in the last 12 years—we overlook the laws which govern our proceedings. The Chair will do the Senator from Indiana the justice to say that he did not rise to a point of order but to a parliamentary inquiry, having voted himself for this very motion, because I did not want to delay the matter, although as a matter of fact I can demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Chair the motion at that time was out of order. But I do not want to take the time of the Senate now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair agrees with the Senator from Indiana that he did rise to a parliamentary inquiry and made a suggestion pending the roll call. The Chair did not think it was in order at that time, and directed the Secretary to proceed with the roll call.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have no quarrel with the Chair on that point. It is a matter which absolutely is of no concern to me, except I always have stood, even against measures which I myself was pressing, against any infraction of the law of procedure in this body as soon as I had informed myself, after having been here a good many years, what that law was. I sometimes think it is far more important for us to maintain rigidly our regular course of business than it is to expedite matters by a few minutes. I voted for the motion because I am interested in this discussion.

Mr. CRAWFORD resumed his speech. After having spoken for five minutes,

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I hope the Senator will not call for a quorum. I am not willing to be a party to force Senators to hear what I have to say. If they do not want to hear it, let them stay in the cloakroom; it is a matter of absolute indifference to me. I am speaking upon a subject in which I am profoundly interested, Mr. President, and I am not speaking out of malice or with a vindictive spirit, because neither has a place in my heart. I can not understand the man who is vindictive and malicious. I can not understand a man of that character, but I can understand the spirit that takes possession of men when they are aroused by a horrible wrong. I can understand the spirit that makes men throw away all fear when they think there is a real menace facing the welfare of their country; and the Republic, sir, will be wounded, wounded to the heart, cut to the quick, if we treat indifferently the things that are laid upon the record in this testimony. So I do not care whether Senators hear me or not. If they do not want to hear me, let them stay in the cloak rooms, but the American people are interested in what is going on here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from South Dakota that, when a Senator rises and addresses the Chair, it is the business of the Chair to ask the Senator having the floor whether he yields or not. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will yield.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I regret very much to interrupt the Senator from South Dakota, but the Senate of the United States is sitting as a jury upon a question affecting the honor and integrity of this body, and I believe that even in the Senate of the United States a jury should not be absent when a case is being argued before the jury. If it is not convenient for the Senate now to be present to hear this argument, I move a recess.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, we have been notified by the Senator from Michigan that the jury has already rendered a verdict in this case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is out of order.

Mr. OWEN. I move a recess until 3 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma stated a hypothetical case as the Chair understood it.

Mr. OWEN. I move a recess until 3 o'clock in the hope that by that time the Senators may find it convenient to attend the session of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate take a recess until 3 o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. OWEN. I rise to a point of order. Can a call be made now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair the Senator has the right to suggest the absence of a quorum at any time. That having been done there is nothing for the Chair to do but to order the Secretary to call the roll.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is true.

Mr. OWEN. I believe that is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beveridge	Clapp	Gore	Piles
Borah	Clark, Wyo.	Guggenheim	Richardson
Bourne	Crawford	Johnston	Root
Bradley	Culberson	Jones	Shively
Brandegee	Cullom	Kean	Smith, Md.
Briggs	Cummins	La Follette	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Curtis	Martin	Stephenson
Brown	Davis	Nelson	Stone
Bulkeley	Depew	Nixon	Swanson
Burkett	Dillingham	Oliver	Taylor
Burrows	du Pont	Owen	Tillman
Burton	Fletcher	Page	Warner
Chamberlain	Frye	Percy	Young

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate stand in recess until 3 o'clock.

Mr. BURROWS. What is the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has moved that the Senate stand in recess until 3 o'clock.

Mr. BURROWS. Does not the roll call disclose the presence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma moved that the Senate take a recess until 3 o'clock; whereupon the absence of a quorum was suggested, and the roll call has just developed the presence of a quorum.

Mr. OWEN. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. CRAWFORD resumed his speech. After having spoken for some time,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from South Dakota has yielded the floor.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yielded it to the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But does the Senator yield the floor, or does he yield to the Senator from Georgia temporarily?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do, because I have not concluded my remarks, and he has given notice that he wished to speak—if I can do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Georgia, but the custom of the Senate is not to permit a Senator occupying the floor to yield to another Senator to occupy the floor in debate. But, of course, the Chair will recognize the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well; but just a moment. I want that understood. Am I giving up the floor entirely? If it is insisted that I go on or yield the floor entirely, I will go on. I can talk some time yet.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be done, if the Senate desires, by unanimous consent, but it is not in accordance with the rules.

Mr. CRAWFORD. All I want to know is that I shall have the opportunity to close my speech.

I want to say here now that I am not making this speech for delay. I am saying what I have to say here in good faith, and I want an opportunity to conclude my remarks. They are not going to be at any undue length, but I want an opportunity to conclude them.

Mr. BACON. I think I can make a statement which will clarify the situation. I gave notice that I would ask to be heard to-day at 2 o'clock, and I did so because the vote is scheduled to be taken to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal, and there will be no other opportunity. At 2 o'clock, the Senator from South Dakota having the floor, I was perfectly willing and consented for him to proceed until 3 o'clock. I do not suppose there will be any difficulty in the world about the Senator again taking the floor and concluding his speech before the vote is taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not see how it is possible that the Senator could not be again recognized if he asks for recognition.

Mr. BACON. He will have the right as a Senator at any time to take the floor when there is an opportunity to do it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And he is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But not by right of having the floor all the time.

Mr. BACON. I think the Chair is entirely correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, some weeks ago I reviewed at some length the testimony in the matter now before the Senate and gave my views with reference to what facts were established by that testimony. I have no desire, having once reviewed the testimony and given my views in regard to it, to detain the Senate for the purpose of further discussion. However, the other day when the sitting Member whose seat is involved in this examination addressed the Senate, a part of his remarks were directed to me and to what I had said. A statement of some length was made by him with reference to the organization of the Legislature of the State of Illinois preceding his election by that legislature to the Senate, in which statement he disclaimed that he personally had anything to do with the organization of that legislative body and charged that the result which followed an attempt to organize the lower house of that legislature was due almost entirely to a very extraordinary course of procedure on the part of the governor of that State. He severely arraigned Gov. Deneen, the governor of the great State of Illinois, now in his second term, for his conduct in undertaking to absolutely, as an outside executive force, organize that body. The explanation of the extraordinary alliance between a few Republicans and Democrats and the election of Mr. Shurtleff as a result was the statement; that it was a sort of uprising against outrageous and officious interference by the governor of that State.

I rose at the time to remark to the sitting Member that Gov. Deneen had no opportunity to answer the charge which was being laid at his door, made, as it was here, long after the testimony had been taken and reported, and made, as it was, in this ex parte fashion by the sitting Member, who was not offering himself here as a witness under oath, who was not here in an attitude that would enable us to accept his statement as testimony and to test it by that cross-examination process which is used for the purpose of eliciting the truth. It was suggested that no interruption should be made in the course of the address of the sitting Member.

I felt then that it was only fair to the governor of the State of Illinois that he be given an opportunity to put into the records of this Senate his answer to this remarkable charge made against him here in this exceedingly dramatic manner. It is with reference to that, more than anything else, Mr. President, that I intend to submit a few remarks to the Senate.

I went to the telegraph office the other day and sent Gov. Deneen a telegram, in which I said to him that Mr. LORIMER charged on the floor that he had undertaken to compel members of the legislature, by threat of removal from office and by the threat to take away from them patronage, to vote against Mr. Shurtleff as a candidate for speaker at the session of the legislature in which Mr. LORIMER was elected; and that that was the reason why the Democrats had made this bipartisan contest in the interest of Mr. Shurtleff, and explained his election as speaker. I also telegraphed him that the statement had been made here that Gov. Deneen could have elected Mr. Hopkins, had he been so disposed; that he had the votes under his control to do it; and that he, Gov. Deneen, had pledged Mr. LORIMER to be a candidate himself and had also been friendly to Mr. LORIMER's candidacy. I am stating not the words of the telegram literally, but I am stating the substance of my communication to him, to which I received a reply addressed to me in language as follows:

My statement published to-day in the newspapers answers the inquiries of your telegram. Also received telegram from Representative Frank Brady, denying statement of Senator LORIMER regarding threats. I did not favor LORIMER for Senator. Understand that Brady's telegram will be published to-morrow. See my statement published by morning and the one published May 29, 1910.

C. S. DENEEN.

This Mr. Frank Brady was brought into the record by the sitting Member the other day, and Gov. Deneen was brought into the record by him in language which was printed in the newspapers as his speech. That speech has not yet been published in the RECORD, but I heard it, and the statement from which I quote, according to my recollection, is a truthful statement of what the sitting Member said in relation to the organization of the House of Representatives at Springfield. In that speech he used this language:

Mr. President, anybody who knows aught of the organization of that legislature would not make that statement—referring to the statement I made in my address to the Senate a few weeks ago.

The facts are that I was not determined to organize the legislature against Gov. Deneen, and, if I had been so determined, under all the conditions existing at that time, it would have been impossible for me to do so. To organize a legislature with the aid of Democrats and Republicans is a matter that can not be done just by a wish or a thought. It requires constant effort to bring about a combination of that sort under what Senators would have us understand was a well-defined plan in the head of just one man.

It happened, Mr. President, that on the 15th day of September I was stricken with illness—

And he goes on to explain how he had gone to the Pacific coast, how he had come from there to Washington, and how on the very day or the following day after the speaker had been elected at Springfield, he, Mr. LORIMER, went on record in voting for some motion in the House of Representatives. He then explained Shurtleff's election as follows:

Edward Shurtleff, Mr. LORIMER declared, was elected speaker of the Illinois House of Representatives because of a condition that arose there, and if the same condition arose anywhere else in the country the result would have been the same. The governor of our State was very much opposed to the reelection of Mr. Shurtleff, and he called in a few of the members and told them that they must elect some person speaker other than Edward Shurtleff.

Gov. Deneen told them that he did not care who was elected speaker, but that under no circumstances must any Republican vote for Edward Shurtleff, and, if they did vote for him, he served notice on them not one of them could expect to receive patronage at the hands of his administration.

He went further than that:

He called in Representative Brady, who had pledged his support to Shurtleff, and he told him that unless he joined with the men that were trying to organize that body under his dictatorship every man who was in the employ of the State on Brady's recommendation would be forthwith dismissed; in other words, the governor of our State undertook to dictate to the general assembly who should be its speaker.

Here he was interrupted by me; and in reply to my protest against his attack upon Gov. Deneen, when the latter could not be heard, he said:

I was in no way connected with the committee which investigated these charges and I have no right to summon Gov. Deneen. During this whole investigation, from the day when I submitted the resolution to make this inquiry last May, no Senator, whether he was a member of the subcommittee or not, will say that I have ever suggested anything to him or made any appeal or in any way at any time tried to influence his judgment as to how he should vote in my case, and so I made no suggestions to the committee as to who should be summoned as a witness. If the Senator from South Dakota is dissatisfied because the governor of our State was not called to refute these statements I am not to blame for it, but it would have been impossible to refute this statement at that time because the cause for making it was not suggested to me until the Senator from South Dakota made it in his speech on this floor just a short time ago.

Then he goes on to say, in reference to Gov. Deneen:

Suppose, Mr. President, that the President of the United States—a President of the United States—I care not who he be, should call in the Senators of his party, tell them who he wanted for President pro tempore of the Senate, tell them how he wanted the Senate committees organized, tell them that unless they did his bidding they could get no patronage under his administration, and tell them that if they failed to do his bidding every last man employed by the Government on their recommendation should be driven from public employment?

Suppose a President could fall so low as to undertake such a feat as that, and that he succeeded in getting into an organization a majority of the Members of this body of his own party to the exclusion of one man and the men who were favorable to him—what do you suppose the Senate would do? What do you suppose party lines would accomplish? It would not take the Senators of this body one moment to make up their minds to cross the party lines and organize the Senate with men whom they thought were fit to hold the different offices in the control of this body.

The men in our State did what any set of sensible, courageous men would do. They organized the body, regardless of the wishes of the executive branch of the government. If the governor of our State had attended to his own business, said nothing to the members of the house, permitted them without coercion to go on and organize that body, Mr. Shurtleff would have been the choice of its members and he would have been elected in the Republican caucus by a unanimous vote.

Mr. President, it seemed to me rather remarkable at the time, and it seems to me yet to be very remarkable, that one of the salient elements, one of the significant occurrences in Springfield which operated powerfully in the shaping up of the situation there that ended in the election of the sitting Member, to wit, the securing of the control of the organization, with all of its patronage, with the influence of its speaker, should not in any way have been the subject of inquiry before the committee, and that the sitting Member in his argument should attempt to destroy its effect as a material fact by making, upon the floor of the Senate, a most sweeping and severe arraignment of the governor of his State, with no possible opportunity either on the part of the governor himself to be heard or on the part of the committee to make investigation of the charges, unless a further continuation of this investigation is had, which all would deplore.

It was remarkable that such a statement should for the first time be made in closing the argument here, placing in that light before the people of this country the governor of a great Commonwealth, a highly respected citizen of Illinois, with a record behind him for achievement, with a record for climbing that ladder which every American boy may climb as long as the stars shine in the heavens above him. It was remarkable that he should be attacked in this manner here, with no opportunity to defend himself and no choice here on the part of a Member of the Senate to do anything except to accept the statement of the sitting Member or refuse to accept it; and so I sent this inquiry to the governor of Illinois.

Mr. President, it is perfectly apparent to any person who has had any experience whatsoever with legislative bodies, with political issues hinging upon the action of a legislature, with the solution of contests between candidates for United States Senatorship before legislative bodies, that one of the most important points in the case for or against a candidate is to be sufficiently fortunate to have the legislative body organized by those who are his friends. It is true in State legislatures, or with most of them, as it is in the National House at Washington, that a tremendous power is wielded by the speaker of the popular house. He names the chairmen of the great committees, the chairman of the committee on corporations, the chairman of the committee on railroads, the chairman of the committee on appropriations, the chairman of the committee on the judiciary, and the membership of each of these great committees, to one or the other of which is referred every important measure that is before the legislature for consideration. Places upon those committees are sought and eagerly sought by members, no matter to which party they belong.

To those who were interested in the election of a United States Senator at Springfield, the control of the organization there was a matter of much concern and the selection of the speaker of the house was a matter of the most extreme importance. Here we have this sweeping charge made upon the floor of the Senate by the sitting Member, so dramatically placing it before this body the other day, that the governor of the great State of Illinois, Gov. Deneen, played the autocrat and attempted to organize the lower branch of the legislature there and to swing a club over the members of that body, threatening that unless they did his will in selecting their presiding officer he would not simply withhold from them, the offending ones, any recognition in the distribution of patronage, but that he went further than that and threatened one of the representatives, Mr. Frank Brady, that he would wreak vengeance upon him by removing from office those who were indebted to him for places.

I say it was a most remarkable thing here, in the closing hours of this debate, after the testimony had been submitted and closed, when there would be no opportunity here to say whether or not these grave and serious charges of usurpation and tyranny lodged upon the floor of the United States Senate by the sitting Member against the governor of a great State for the purpose of placing upon him the responsibility for this most remarkable situation at Springfield for that charge to be made here under such circumstances; not as a witness under oath, subjecting himself to cross-examination, where the facts could be elicited by all the tests that can be applied in such cases, but under the privileges of this floor he made a statement so sweeping, a charge so remarkable, that it seems to me only fair and decent that the governor of the State of Illinois should have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. President, speaking with reference to the governor of Illinois I desire to say that I am not here as a special pleader in his behalf. My acquaintance with him is not at all intimate. I had the pleasure of making a trip with him once on the Mississippi River and on one other occasion of traveling with him from Chicago to Washington. I am somewhat familiar, as we all are, with his career, and it is a career which appeals to us just as the review of some of the incidents in his life given here the other day by the sitting Member appealed to us. Incidents in the career of both are the highest tributes to America and to this great Republic. It is not a matter of regret but it is one of profound gratification in which we all alike rejoice that in this country a boy can come up from the humble position of peddling newspapers and blacking boots, that he can climb the ladder with the stars of hope shining in the sky above him and keep on climbing until he reaches the highest place in the gift of the Nation. Instead of being a subject for pity the opportunities given to vigorous youth of this country, born in humble environment, gives joy rather than sorrow and sadness. I think the most unfortunate youth in the United States is the youth who is born in wealth—who is so unfortunate as to be born in an environment that does not require of him that he make struggles and win triumphs like these which both LORIMER and Deneen have met and won.

I recall that Charles S. Deneen, the governor of the great State of Illinois, is the son of a Methodist minister who rode circuit in Illinois away back in the days when the venerable Senator from that State who sits at my right was a youth. I recall the story—he told me a little of it himself—of Charles S. Deneen, a boy without money and without friends, who went into the great city of Chicago and started his splendid career. I remember his telling me how he made his living in those days by teaching night schools, reading law in the daytime.

As the governor of the great State over which he is presiding with credit, Gov. Deneen should be dealt with by the Senate at least justly. He should at least have an opportunity to be heard when the accusation is laid at his door that he was a usurper and a tyrant who caused a rebellion to arise in the Legislative Assembly of Illinois so strong that party lines were considered as secondary; that because of this rebellion, caused by the power of a tyrant, there was no longer any distinction between Democrats and Republicans, but they organized the legislature as freemen to overthrow a tyrant governor, Charles S. Deneen, the Methodist minister's son, whom the people of Illinois by their suffrage had placed in the position of their chief executive. Let us hear what he says. It is only fair, it is only just, that he have an opportunity to be heard here.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand the statement to which Gov. Deneen referred in his telegram to me. I hold in my hand all that I am able to present here as an answer to this grave charge laid at his door upon the floor of the Senate, with no opportunity for cross-examination, without even the sanctity of an oath having been administered, and with no opportunity upon his part to make answer. I do what I can in justice to the governor of Illinois to give to the Senate the answer which he makes to this charge of tyranny and usurpation and unjust interference on his part with the Legislature of Illinois to such an extent that it is claimed it caused a rebellion there, which broke down all party lines, so that these free men of the State of Abraham Lincoln could assert themselves. What does the governor say?

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., February 23, 1911.

"But what does all this have to do with the charge that Senator LORIMER was elected by the corrupt use of money?"

With these words Gov. Deneen closes a statement made late last night in reply to that portion of Senator LORIMER'S speech in the United States Senate wherein the junior Senator attempted further to complicate the issue in his case. Gov. Deneen's statement follows.

The governor refers to this statement in his telegram to me, in which he says:

My statement, published to-day in the newspapers, answers the inquiries of your telegram.

The statement to which Gov. Deneen refers is as follows:

I have only such meager information regarding the speech made by Senator LORIMER to-day as appeared in the afternoon editions of the Springfield papers. I notice, however, that he followed the course which I have often observed is followed by men charged with serious offenses in Cook County when I was State's attorney there, of trying to escape explanation of the facts against him by making charges against men who are not on trial. He has followed the course of Mr. Erbstein, one of the attorneys for Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne, who was recently indicted and tried in the criminal courts of Cook County for jury bribing and who refrained from going on the witness stand to testify under oath, where he could be cross-examined, and, instead, made a speech to the jury, where his statements were not subject to the rules of cross-examination.

Mr. LORIMER in his speech charges—

1. That I consented to become a candidate for Senator and then immediately withdrew. This is not true.

This is the language of the governor of Illinois, made to the American people, and referred to in his telegram received by me when I told him what charges had been made against him on the floor of the Senate—

That I consented to become a candidate for Senator and then immediately withdrew. This is not true.

A denial under these circumstances is entitled to just as much credit as the charge, because the man making the charge is in a desperate situation and does not make it under oath, while the man who answers it is simply stating what is the fact as he knows it.

This is not true—

Says Gov. Deneen—

I never gave my consent to him or anybody else to become a candidate, but, on the contrary, refused to do so and stated to everyone who spoke to me upon the subject that I refused to become a candidate and would not accept the office if elected.

We are told how awful it is to attack a man's character and reputation, and I indorse every word of it. But an attempt is being made to claim that this investigation, instead of being an investigation to ascertain whether there was a valid election, is an investigation to assassinate character.

You can make that charge in every murder trial by saying it is a conspiracy on the part of the State's attorney and the prosecuting witnesses and the sheriff to ruin the character of the poor man put upon his proof. If we are to retreat from the performance of our duty in enforcing law, if we are to refuse to consider charges that go to the very heart of the Republic, charges of bribery in elections, that strike a death wound to the heart of society; if we are to run away from our duty in a case of this character because some one says it is an attempt to assassinate character, we are writing ourselves down as cowards.

Great God, are we to throw aside direct testimony of bribery and the unlawful use of money to corrupt elections and run away because some one says we will injure the good name and reputation of the man who is the recipient of the fruits of the fraud?

Better tear down our courthouses, better burn up our statutes, better abolish the Senate, better let every man do as he pleases rather than be governed by any such motive or by any such appeal as that.

The governer goes on:

2. He charges that Edward Shurtleff—

I call attention to this—

2. He charges that Edward Shurtleff became speaker of the house because I threatened to deprive representatives of patronage should they vote for him, and that I tried to elect one of my friends as speaker. Neither of these charges is true.

Thus answers the governor of Illinois.

"Neither of these charges is true" rings out through the press of the country the next morning after they were uttered here. "Neither of these charges is true," says this son of a Methodist minister, who, in his earlier days, taught a night school in Chicago while fighting for a place at the bar, now an honored citizen and the chief executive of his State.

"Neither of these charges is true." I say his denial is entitled to as much credence here as the charges made by the Senator, who has everything at stake and who makes them at the last moment, with no opportunity for cross-examination; makes them not under oath but through courtesy here. You can not throw aside this statement of the governor of Illinois, whose good name has been attacked here as a tyrant, a usurper, a dictator, that these charges are not true.

I threatened no one with taking patronage from him, nor did I ask any member to vote for any particular person for speaker. I urged the Republicans to go into a Republican caucus and abide by the will of the majority as expressed there; and had Mr. Shurtleff been selected as Republican candidate for speaker in a Republican caucus, any man who would have followed my advice would have supported him.

This is a frank, candid, and open statement of an honest man, a man willing to recognize the right of the majority of his party to rule.

"The same situation arose here last month," says Gov. Deneen. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], whose time I really am trespassing upon, that as soon as I finish making this statement of Gov. Deneen, so that I may have it in the RECORD, while I will not have concluded all I wish to say, I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Georgia. In a way, I am really trespassing on his time.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if the Senator will finish within an hour I am willing to have him go on rather than break into his speech.

Mr. CRAWFORD. When will the hour end?

Mr. BACON. At 3 o'clock, say.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will do the best I can.

Mr. BACON. I am willing the Senator shall go on until then.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Gov. Deneen goes on to say:

The same situation arose here last month at the beginning of the present session of the general assembly. Mr. Shurtleff and his friends again refused to go into the regular Republican caucus. The other 64 Republicans, most of whom were my friends, went into the caucus and there selected Mr. Charles Adkins as the Republican candidate. I urged the Republicans to go into this caucus and abide by its decision, but did not indicate to any Republican any preference for speaker.

Immediately after Mr. Adkins had been chosen for speaker it appeared that Mr. Shurtleff and his friends, who were hostile to me and were opposed to the Republican platform, would be given conspicuous places and would, in fact, dominate the house organization. Notwithstanding this was apparent, every one of the 64 members who went into the caucus voted for Mr. Adkins for speaker because he was the caucus nominee.

3. Senator LORIMER states that I could have elected Mr. Hopkins Senator at any time. In view of the fact that he charges in the same breath that I could not elect a speaker, this statement falls by its own weight and needs no further refutation.

4. He states that Mr. Shurtleff was one of Mr. Hopkins's managers. This will be news in Illinois.

5. He has added to the list of candidates, whom he claimed in his speech of May 28, 1910, that he submitted to me, Mr. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS. My answer made on May 29, the day after Mr. LORIMER'S speech in the Senate, stands now as to Mr. Foss also.

He then goes on as follows, quoting Mr. LORIMER:

I urged him [Deneen] to become a candidate, telling him I believed he would reunite our party, torn asunder by factional strife. The proposal to elect me United States Senator was not by Republican votes alone, but I was assured by him that I would get practically the entire Democratic vote in the house.

No one who is familiar with the situation but knows that the majority of the Republicans were at all times for Senator Hopkins and would not have voted for me had I become a candidate or for anyone else—

We are told here that they did not intend to observe the popular vote, that none of them intended to follow it; but Gov. Deneen says:

No one who is familiar with the situation but knows that the majority of the Republicans were at all times for Senator Hopkins, and would not have voted for me had I become a candidate or for anyone else; and the only hope of electing anybody but Senator Hopkins lay in securing a large Democratic support. No Democrat offered me such support; and the assurances of that vote came entirely from Senator LORIMER, who appeared even at that time to have authority to speak for the Democrats in this matter.

I notice that he gives reasons why the Democracy would support him. I have looked in vain in his speech for reasons why they would support me or any other Republican whom he named in his speech to-day, none of whom could have gotten a majority of the Republicans, because the majority felt bound by the primary vote to vote for Senator Hopkins.

Mr. President, was I making a radical statement when I said that a few unprincipled men threw to one side, threw to the winds, the verdict which the people had rendered, and sought to circumvent it? Gov. Deneen says:

Because the majority felt bound by the primary vote to vote for Senator Hopkins.

The truth is—

Now, here is a very significant fact, and I call the attention of the Senate to it, because it shows what had been going on long before the legislature met. Here is what Gov. Deneen says:

The truth is the bipartisan coalition which reached its climax in the election of Senator LORIMER was formed in the general assembly which preceded his election for the purpose of defeating me. To injure me it made a spurious investigation of our State institutions; it made corrupt alliances with certain interests that could not use me to secure my defeat in the primaries and got a very influential wing of the Democratic Party to unite with it in this effort. It was the understanding then that if the effort to defeat me at the primaries failed the Republican members of the bipartisan coalition would in turn join with the Democrats to defeat me at the polls, a program which was followed to the letter.

Gov. Deneen was hounded as perhaps no one in the history of the country was hounded, not by Democrats, but by members of his own party, belonging to the Lorimer and Yates factions, who came within a few thousand votes of defeating him, and then started factional committees out over the State to examine the institutions for partisan purposes—for factional partisan purposes. The governor tells us about it. He says:

After the election it became apparent that the Republican wing of this bipartisan coalition would not go into a Republican caucus upon the speakership, where they would be in a hopeless minority, and before the general assembly met it became apparent, also, that they would join with the Democrats to elect a speaker and organize the house of representatives on bipartisan lines. This was done, and Mr. Shurtleff was elected speaker.

Mr. President, I said in my speech that the election of that speaker was the first step in a corrupt program and that the selection of Lee O'Neil Browne as minority leader was the second step in a corrupt program, and that a union of forces between the men who had been heretofore handling the jack pot with the men who wanted to elect a Senator was the third step in a corrupt program; and I do not back a hair's breadth from that statement, because the facts justify it.

Talk about this happening while the sitting Member was over here in the House of Representatives! The sitting Member did not have to be in Springfield, for he had been carrying on a campaign all summer and all fall before the November election; he had his forces well in hand; and they were at Springfield. I did not say he was there at that time. I said the Lorimer Republicans went into this combination with the Democrats and elected Shurtleff speaker against Hopkins and against Gov. Deneen; and I do not back from it a hair's breadth, because it is a fact, and the record proves it. Gov. Deneen says:

After the election it became apparent that the Republican wing of this bipartisan coalition would not go into a Republican caucus upon the speakership, where they would be in a hopeless minority, and before the general assembly met it became apparent also that they would join with the Democrats to elect a speaker and organize the house of representatives on bipartisan lines. This was done, and Mr. Shurtleff was elected speaker.

It was understood that the first fruits of this coalition would be to unseat me as governor, and the public is familiar with the long-drawn-out contest, where the plan was to unseat me without counting votes, upon trumped-up general charges affecting every county in the State. Finally, the contest committee ruled that they would have to file specifications, when the whole rotten fabric of false accusation dissolved and disappeared.

This is a fine situation, indeed, a plot not only to go in with the opposing party, select a speaker, and secure control of the patronage of the lower branch of the legislature against a Republican governor, but to also put up a job on that governor by a daring attempt to remove him from office and to thereby secure control of the State. The election of the speaker was the first step in this program, which I denounced as a corrupt program conducted by unprincipled men, and which I said ripened into bitter fruit afterwards; and so it did. Gov. Deneen continues:

It was understood that the first fruits of this coalition would be to unseat me as governor, and the public is familiar with the long-drawn-out contest, where the plan was to unseat me without counting votes, upon trumped-up general charges affecting every county in the State.

God save us from this kind of politics! God knows, in His wisdom, that the only way His people can rule is to take power out of the hands of such an outfit as this. You ask why these popular uprisings; you ask why there is agitation for the initiative and referendum. It is because the people are distrustful of such legislatures as this. I do not believe in the extremities to which they go in some of the States, but I submit that it is the natural result of a situation like this in Chicago, under the rule of "Hinky Dink" and "Bathhouse John;" it is the natural rebellion against such conditions in Tammany and in other great cities. You are surprised because the people, who, in their heart of hearts, believe in their God and in their fellow men, hug the belief that there ought to be something pure and wholesome in our political life, are shocked when they learn of such conditions as these at Springfield.

Ah, it will not do to harden the heart and turn the back to all this or to put it aside lightly, or to say, as some have stated to me in letters, "they all do it." "You make a great fuss over it, but it is done everywhere." Great God, is that to become the common belief of our people? Mr. President, we ought to stop and take an invoice here; to think seriously; not dismiss an important proceeding, an inquiry like this, because of a fear that it will injure the reputation of one man. Why, that man is a mere incident here. I can love him in my heart and desire to help him, but I will never, so long as I have a voice and a breath in my body, stand for a fraud like that established in this case—never. It can not be dismissed as worthy of only a passing thought. I can not conceive how men can look at a situation like this in that way.

"Oh," they say, "we are making these appeals to the galleries here because we think it popular." What a sordid and suspicious view that is of a situation like this. Mr. President, there are people all over this country living in homes, where the old family Bible lies on the center table; where the New Testament is read to the children in the morning, and where every day prayer goes up to Almighty God for the preservation of the Government. From such homes come the recruits that take the leadership in the great responsibilities of our national life, the recruits that guide the destinies of the Nation and enable it to continue in its course. They come from those homes; they become your railway presidents, your great bank presidents, your great engineers. The men and women in these homes have a profound interest in this case. What do you suppose their opinion is of this sort of thing? Mr. President, if an invader was endeavoring to land on either shore of this Republic with the purpose to destroy the Government and these institutions, there is not a man in this Senate but would be on his feet, and the old song, "My country 'tis of thee," would take possession of his heart; the tears would run down his cheeks; he would be willing to sacrifice everything he had on earth to save his country; yet with apparent indifference we look upon a poison canker in our political life where men are selling their votes, where men are getting into office through the use of money, where, in places like Springfield, legislation is being sold, and where men confess that they received money to cast their votes for a Member of this Senate, and it is easier to dismiss it as not worthy of our concern. It is easier to dispose of it all by dismissing this great mass of testimony so strong and so convincing by believing that it is false.

It is easier to prefer simply to fold our righteous robes about us and to hug the delusion that we are not required to look upon rottenness like that; to turn our backs to it; and to believe that it does not exist at all. There is no one so blind as he who will not see. Gov. Deneen says:

It was understood that the first fruits of this coalition would be to unseat me as governor, and the public is familiar with the long-drawn-out contest, where the plan was to unseat me without counting votes upon trumped-up general charges affecting every county in the State. Finally the contest committee ruled that they would have to file specifications, when the whole rotten fabric of false accusation dissolved and disappeared.

It was after this that I was offered the nomination for the senatorship by men who had waged this unrelenting warfare against me for so long a time. Manifestly, the only purpose of such a proposal from such a source was to get me out of the governorship, where I stood in the way of their plans, and leave to this bipartisan combination the reuniting of the Republican Party, torn asunder by factional strife. What interest the 53 Democrats who voted for Senator LORIMER had in the reconciliation of Republican factions, torn asunder by factional strife, doth not yet appear.

But what does all this have to do with the charges or the evidence that Mr. LORIMER was elected by corrupt use of money?

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to another very significant fact, which is that the wonderfully dramatic and appealing statement made here the other day was an avoidance. I will not say a "confession and avoidance," but an avoidance, because it did not deal with a single one of the concrete facts established in the record in this case. It was a very appealing story about selling newspapers and meeting Hinky Dink and getting a job for the man whose wife was sick; but the sitting Member, when he got through with that whole story, only made the claim that he had accounted for 34 Democratic votes, and he said those 34 friends of his got the rest of them for him.

They got the rest, but how did they get them? He says John Broderick was one of those friends. Well, we know how John got one of them, and the sitting Member did not deny that John got it in that way. He simply undertook to explain how he got 34 votes, but there were 19 more, and how did he get them?

I am not going to review all the testimony. The Senate would not hear me if I should do so, even though I did it ever so well; they are tired of this case and all that, but, Mr. President, it remains, and it will remain in this record forever, that Charles White left O'Fallon, Ill., on one day and went to Chicago. He met Lee O'Neil Browne there and came back home the next day. He went to the cashier of a department store and gave him an envelope with $800 in it, and wrote his name on that envelope, and the cashier of the store put it in his vault and kept it over night for him. It is in that record, and it will remain there forever, that the next morning White went down to his office and called his stenographer, Miss Van-deveer, and there they made a list of his debts and his debtors, and he called them in and paid off their debts; that he took their receipted bills, and those receipted bills are in the record.

It is in that testimony, and it will remain there forever, that the man who had been in business with White at O'Fallon, Ill.—John W. Dennis, who gave his testimony—knew of White going to Chicago, saw him when he returned, knew that he did not have a dollar before he went, and saw $200 on his table in his office when he got back. Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne admits that he met White in Chicago in the Briggs House at this very time. Everybody admits that White was a spendthrift, a gambler, a drunkard, and that he had drawn his salary in Springfield in February and speedily spent it, and this was in June. What is one to do with testimony of that kind? Oh, the self-righteous may refuse to look at it. They may wrap their cloaks about them and turn their backs to it, and say, "We prefer not to see it, though we know it is there, because to believe it would be a reflection upon some man's character." There is none so blind as he who will not see.

Beckemeyer says he went over to St. Louis on one trip, that he met Browne there, that he got $1,000, and that he went over there on another trip and met Robert E. Wilson and got $900. Did he act like an honest man? He says he took that money and put $500, as I recall, in the Commercial Trust Company Bank; and the man who went with him to identify him went on the stand and said he saw Beckemeyer do this. Then, what did he do with the rest? He did not want to be caught with it on his person. He did not deposit it in his home bank, but took it over to a bank in another town, deposited it there, and then drew a few bills at a time. He would have the big bills exchanged into little bills and put the little bills into his pocket, spending that money for expenses a little at a time, and when that was gone, he would go back and get some more large bills, have them changed, and spend the money in the same way.

How natural and consistent that is with guilt and how utterly inconsistent it is with innocence; yet men do not want to believe it. They simply turn their backs upon it and say, "We refuse to believe it because it is an unpleasant thing to do; it will involve a Senator; it may put him out; it may involve him during all his future life in disgrace; and therefore we do not want to believe it and we will not believe it;" men may be found who will shut their eyes against the plain truth and refuse to believe it. There is none so blind as he who will not see.

Mr. Holstlaw comes up from a town in southern Illinois and goes to the west side of Chicago and into a saloon that he had never been to before in all his life. The man whom he visited there takes him into his office and pays him $2,500. He goes over to the State Bank of Chicago, deposits it there in the regular course of business, and a deposit slip is made in the usual course of business. The man who saw him come in, who looked upon him when he came, who took the money out of his hand, and who placed it to his credit or to the credit of his bank at Iuka, goes on the witness stand and says, "This is the man. On such a day this is the man who came into my bank; I saw him myself; I accepted this money from him; I put it in my bank; and here is the deposit slip. It was made out in the regular course of business at the time."

But, "Oh," they say, "we do not believe it, because we prefer to think that there is something irregular about the deposit slip, because we prefer to think that it might have been a manufactured and forged deposit slip."

The cashier of that bank goes on the stand and says:

I saw this man come into the bank; I took this money from him; I placed it to the credit of his bank at Iuka.

Not one cross-question is put to him that impugns his good faith; not one inconsistent statement is wrung out of him; but men say he committed a perjury, and men say that because Gov. Deneen, of Illinois, was a stockholder in that bank, the great governor of a great sovereign State being a stockholder, a bank in Chicago that received $2,500 from Mr. Holstlaw is to be put under suspicion for having been guilty of a direct forgery in connection with a deposit slip. Ah, you can not get away from the probative force of this testimony by that.

John Broderick lived in a certain ward in Chicago. He was a friend of Mr. LORIMER; he got many votes for Mr. LORIMER in another ward, and he had been Mr. LORIMER'S friend for years. It is this friend, John Broderick, who had the deal with Holstlaw, and it is this man Holstlaw who comes in with a statement that he was in a corrupt furniture deal in the legislature, a statement which he put in writing; but it is said that that should all be swept aside because the State's attorneys in Chicago and in Springfield insisted on finding out the truth. Would you ever have convicted the Sugar Trust if you had not jerked a man out of the penitentiary, pardoned him, and had him turn State's evidence to get the truth? What are you going to do with violators of law in this day when money is ruling? The Sugar Trust and others are violating the law, and they control the machinery of the law, if possible, and if you attempt to get the men who are accomplices with them and get the truth out of them you will be guilty of violating the rules of law and order, and it is "the third degree." Men who cry the loudest about "the third degree" are the men who do not want crimes to be uncovered. The men who cry out the loudest always against peace officers and prosecutors are the men who want the man who is on trial to escape.

I will yield now to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I have not entirely concluded my remarks, but the Senator had announced that he was going to speak at this time, and I yield the floor to him.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. HALE. The conclusion which has been reached is just exactly in the line of the course and precedents in the Senate. The Chair undoubtedly is right. No Senator can yield to another Senator to go on and make a speech and keep the floor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly not.

Mr. HALE. And when a Senator has done that there never has been an instance in my experience in the Senate when a Senator, either from fatigue or for any other reason, has yielded the floor that he was not afterwards recognized by the Chair, and proceeded——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course.

Mr. HALE. As a matter of course.

Mr. BACON. I think I substantially said the same thing. The Senator from South Dakota will have to be recognized de novo, if he is recognized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Georgia is speaking in his own time.

Mr. BACON. It is a little embarrassing for me to do the same thing now, but the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] has asked me to give him a few minutes for the purpose of presenting some views upon the same subject as that upon which I am to address the Senate, and I therefore yield the floor and trust to my opportunity to regain it afterwards.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish simply to make——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. I gave notice this morning that on Wednesday I would address the Senate on the Lorimer resolution, so called. I find that a vote on the constitutional amendment for the direct election of Senators is set to be taken immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning. I should like to modify the notice I gave to-day and say that if I can do so I will proceed with what I have to say on the election case immediately after the vote is taken on the constitutional amendment to-morrow morning.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 134) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate just for a few moments to give the reasons why I shall vote for the joint resolution submitting to the legislatures the question of the popular election of Senators with the Sutherland amendment in it. I will not take long. I promised the Senator from Georgia I would not take over seven or eight minutes. I will ask Senators kindly not to interrupt me.

Mr. President, I would rather not have the Sutherland amendment, and opposed it with all my strength. It is now a part of the resolution; and the question with me is, Shall I vote for this resolution or against it with this amendment in it? I have reached the conclusion to support the resolution with the amendment. In the several arguments that I have addressed to the Senate upon the Sutherland amendment I stated that I had not arrived at any conclusion as to whether I would support the resolution with the amendment incorporated in it. I also took good care to state that I objected to the amendment principally upon the ground that I did not consider it necessary, believing, as I still do, that Federal laws could be enacted by Congress to prevent violence, intimidation, or corruption at the polls without the Sutherland amendment as well as they could with it.

I am so strongly in favor of the election of Senators by the people that I can not possibly turn the proposition down because it contains a provision that might probably give rise to trouble in the future. We will be prepared to meet the trouble if it should ever come. Public opinion would not tolerate the passage of any measure similar to the force bill. I think that is a dead issue, buried beyond the chance of political resurrection. Nor can I by my own vote delay this great question until the next Congress. The vote may delay it, but I shall not and can not participate in that plan. I want to expedite it with all my might and strength. I have fought for this proposition for the greater part of my public career and believe in it with all my heart. I consider that it will be the greatest political reform accomplished by the present generation.

The proposition that the people are incapable of selecting Senators seems to me too absurd for consideration. I have not a lingering fear of the incapacity of the people in this regard. I would rather trust the people than trust the legislature. Intelligence rules the day. If the people select an incompetent Representative, then it is the people's fault, and it is not for us to criticize them.

The people want this change and they will have it. It is not the clamor of the mob; it is not the impulse of agitation; it is the deliberate and matured thought of the American people that the change shall come. Between the people and the legislature I prefer the people, and I would not want to hold my place here for a moment if I thought the popular sentiment of my State was against me. Legislatures are one thing, the people are another. Legislatures are sometimes controlled by political managers, and the people at this hour are in the humor of breaking the bonds of political despotism. The day of tyranny is over in this Republic, and the rising generation is no longer being driven to the polls like cattle to the shambles, but is marching in unbroken phalanx with free ballots and ballots that are not for sale. From the ranks of labor and from our colleges and universities they come. They understand this question and demand that it shall be submitted to the legislatures of the States. They will not tolerate the suggestion that has been advanced here that they are too ignorant to decide it.

From whence comes this suggestion that the people can not perform the function of selecting Senators? I have hardly ever heard of it outside of this Senate Chamber. I am satisfied that this body contains a membership better equipped in point of character and ability to perform the important duties assigned to them than any other parliamentary assemblage in the world. But, on the other hand, I do not believe we will deteriorate if the people are allowed to make the selection.

I recognize the fact that this is a representative government, but great changes have taken place since the adoption of the Constitution, and the greatest of all changes apparent now on the surface to the casual observer is that there should be a closer relationship between the people and their public servants.

If the people have not the intelligence or the capacity to select their Representatives, then we had better submit a constitutional amendment to change our form of government from a republic to a monarchy. If the people must have political slave masters let us invest them with royal power and hereditary prerogative. If the people are wanting in the qualifications requisite to select Senators, then, in my judgment, the Republic is a failure. Who says that they can not be trusted? We say so. Who has authorized us to say so? We are not the masters; we are the servants of the people; and if the States demand that this question should be submitted to them, in my judgment we had better no longer trifle with their appeal.

I am not influenced by passion or feeling, but my mind has kept pace, solemnly kept pace, with this mighty problem, and we can not prevent its consummation. We may impede it, we may delay it, we may throw obstacles in its path, we may obstruct it, but the day of reckoning and accountability will come.

I shall therefore support this resolution for two reasons: First, because I believe in it; and, second, because I know that the people want it. Either reason would be sufficient for me. Some Senator, speaking in opposition to this resolution and substantially repeating what another great Senator years ago had said before who spoke in the same vein, observed that if we pass it we will wreck the Constitution and founder the ship of state.

Mr. President, the Constitution is subject to amendment. Fifteen amendments have been made to it, and I venture to say that no amendment that ever will be made to it will impair the spirit of the instrument. So far as the ship of state is concerned, it will weather the gale that has practically spent itself in this Chamber. It may be necessary to change pilots, it may be necessary to jettison a part of the cargo, the shores may be strewn with stranded hulks, but armed and equipped with the manhood and the courage and the honor of the Nation, Mr. President, the ship of state is safe. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Applause in the galleries is not permitted.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not propose to address myself to the general subject as to whether or not this change should be made in the fundamental law, to wit, the change from an election of Senators by the legislature to an election by the people. That I consider to be an issue which has been thoroughly discussed in the Senate. I have announced my position in regard to it. But I shall address myself exclusively to the question whether it is safe to adopt the joint resolution with the Sutherland amendment upon it as it has been engrafted upon it by the action of the Senate.

The resolution, Mr. President, as it came from the Committee on the Judiciary proposed to amend the present provision in the Constitution so that in reference to the election of Senators it would read as follows:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.
> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

The remaining portion of the resolution recommended by the Judiciary Committee it is unnecessary to now read, as there is no issue or contention in regard thereto.

That joint resolution, as it thus came from the Committee on the Judiciary, I favored, and would still vote for the joint resolution if it were presented to us for action in those words. By the adoption by the Senate of the Sutherland amendment, however, the additional words have been practically added, so that that clause, as amended, reads this way:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the place of the choosing of Senators.

It is true that the latter part of the resolution as amended is found in another part of the Constitution. But that is the effect of the amendment, and the amended resolution is the same as if it read just as I have recited it to the Senate.

In that shape I am not in favor of it, and I can not vote for it, because I do not believe that it is safe to the country at large and my section in particular. I do not believe that it is either wise, just, or safe that the manner of choosing Senators by direct vote by the people should be regulated and controlled by the Federal Government, and it is upon that proposition that I ask the consideration of the Senate.

I begin by saying that, of course, it is recognized that that language is the language used by the Constitution as it now stands in regard to the election of Representatives, and that under the proposed change all the powers that the Federal Government has in the control of the election of Representatives will be powers which can be exercised in the control of the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people.

At a later time in my argument I am going to discuss the question whether this is no change in the law or whether in the retention of the present language of the Constitution and making it applicable to the changed conditions it is in effect a great change; and I think I will be able to show that it is a most radical change. The words as now found in the Constitution are applicable to an entirely different condition of affairs. In the one case the words are applicable to an election of Representatives by the people and the control of their manner of election in all of its details by the Federal Government. In the other case, as it now stands, although the same words are used, it is a matter which relates simply to the question of an election of Senators by the legislature now practically under the exclusive control of the State. It is an entirely different thing when the same words are made applicable to the control by the Federal Government of all the details of election of Senators by direct vote of the people.

Mr. President, the first thing that I think it is well for us to advert to and to recognize is this: That the language proposed to be applied in this case by the Sutherland amendment in the use of the words "manner of holding elections" is an unlimited expression.

So far as the time of holding Senatorial elections is concerned, I have no objection whatever to that. I am perfectly willing that the Federal Government should have, as it has in the case of the appointment of electors for President, the right to prescribe the time for the election. I would have no objection to the Sutherland amendment so far as it relates to the question of time. But when it comes to the question of the manner of holding elections I repeat that it must be recognized that that is an expression without limitation; that it includes everything which relates to the details of holding that election. It includes everything in connection with the election except the question of the qualifications of the elector. The qualifications of the elector, of course, can not be affected by the power being vested in the Federal Government to control the manner of election, because in another portion of the Constitution it is prescribed that the elector shall be the one who is authorized to vote for a member of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. That is not affected by this Sutherland amendment. But it does affect everything which relates to the ascertainment of who is comprised within that definition. It does relate to the decision as to whether he is or is not one who, under the law, is qualified to vote for a member of the most numerous branch of the legislature. It does give the power to determine in this way who shall vote and who shall not vote.

Let us advert a little to the details. What are the details of the manner of an election? We have two ways in which we can judge of that. First by our general view as to what the words mean, and second by the accepted view of what the words mean as found in statutes which have heretofore been enacted under that provision in the Constitution for the purpose of exercising the power and practically of determining what is meant by "the manner."

That has been repeatedly done, and attempted to be done at other times, by the enactment of laws prescribing "the manner" in which Representatives should be elected. So that we have the general interpretation, from our knowledge of the meaning of the term and from the accepted interpretation as exercised by Congress in the enactment of laws.

Mr. President, the manner will include various things which have been adverted to here in the course of the debate, the first of which may be mentioned as the power to appoint registrars. The power is fully recognized in decisions of the Supreme Court, in which they say that Congress has a right to appoint registrars of election under this particular provision of the Constitution, the meaning of which I am attempting to discuss. The court has decided that Congress would have the right to appoint registrars under the power to prescribe the manner of holding elections, and they could have gone still further and decided that Congress would have the right to enact a law of registration.

If it is true that the entire subject is within the control of Congress, Congress has not simply the right to appoint registrars, but it has the right to enact a registration law. It has the right not simply to appoint officers who shall supervise the registration, but it has the right to appoint Federal officers who shall determine who had the right of registration in the first instance and to preside over the act of enrolling those entitled to vote, and in that way, having the right to determine at each poll and precinct who has the right to be registered and who has not the right to be registered.

Taking this somewhat a little in detail, I wish to call attention to the immense power that the power to appoint registrars and to pass an act of registration would give to the Federal Government in the control of elections. Again, saying that the Government would have no right to determine what should be the qualifications of a voter, it would be within the power of the Government to clothe the registrars with such power that they would in the exercise of a very wide discretion have almost unlimited control of the question who should go upon the registration lists or who should be excluded from the registration lists. The State might prescribe the qualification of those entitled to vote, but the Federal registrars, in the exercise of their power and their discretion, may utterly defeat the purpose and design of the State and order the registration of persons whom it was the intention of the State to exclude from the ballot box.

I want to make an illustration of that from the law in my own State. Under the law Georgia, with Federal registrars clothed with power to decide who should be registered and who should not be registered, with Federal registrars of a strong political bias, as they certainly would be under political appointment, there is scarcely a man of any degree of intelligence in the State of Georgia who could not, under the law of Georgia, be put upon the registration lists, although it is the design of the State law to exclude unworthy and incompetent men from the voting lists.

We have a very liberal law in Georgia, Mr. President. It is true it contains what is generally known as the grandfather clause, but it is not limited to that by any means. I can not read the entire law, but I will insert enough of it to make it plain what the qualifications are which illustrate the statement I make as to the power these Federal registrars would have in determining who should be permitted to register as voters. This was adopted as an amendment to our constitution in 1907. Paragraph 4 of the law is in these words:

Par. 4. Every male citizen of this State shall be entitled to register as an elector and to vote in all elections of said State who is not disqualified under the provisions of section 2 of article 2 of this constitution, and who possesses the qualifications prescribed in paragraphs 2 and 3 of this section, or who will possess them at the date of the election occurring next after his registration, and who, in addition thereto, comes within either of the classes provided for in the five following subdivisions of this paragraph.

1. All persons who have honorably served in the land or naval forces of the United States in the Revolutionary War, or in the War of 1812, or in the War with Mexico, or in any war with the Indians, or in the War between the States, or in the War with Spain, or who honorably served in the land or naval forces of the Confederate States, or of the State of Georgia in the War between the States; or

2. All persons lawfully descended from those embraced in the classes enumerated in the subdivision next above; or

3. All persons who are of good character, and understand the duties and obligations of citizenship under a republican form of government; or

4. All persons who can correctly read in the English language any paragraph of the Constitution of the United States, or of this State, and correctly write the same in the English language when read to them by any one of the registrars, and all persons who solely, because of physical disability, are unable to comply with the above requirements, but who can understand and give a reasonable interpretation of any paragraph of the Constitution of the United States, or of this State, that may be read to them by any one of the registrars; or

5. Any person who is the owner in good faith, in his own right, of at least 40 acres of land situated in this State, upon which he resides, or is the owner in good faith, in his own right, of property situated in this State, and assessed for taxation at the value of $500.

Mr. President, I have read all this, but the particular paragraph to which I call attention is the third, containing the qualification——

All persons who are of good character, and understand the duties and obligations of citizenship under a republican form of government.

I repeat the proposition, that with a vast horde of illiterates in the State and a people unacquainted with the duties of citizenship, with a vast horde of those whom it is dangerous to intrust with the ballot, with the vast multitude of people whom every consideration of good government and good, orderly society would suggest should not be those who were to control in political affairs, it would be perfectly competent under this liberal constitutional provision of the State of Georgia for any set of Federal registrars, who might be controlled by political passion and political bias, in the wide discretion which would be theirs under that provision to register almost every negro and every white man undesirable in his character, and permit him to exercise the elective franchise.

Therefore, I say, Mr. President, without dwelling upon it at length, but putting that simply by way of illustration, it is an extremely dangerous power to confer upon the Federal Government under conditions such as exist in a large part of the country; that it is dangerous to confer upon the Federal Government the power to appoint registrars. It would be still more dangerous to empower the Federal Government to make registration laws in a State; and the power to control and prescribe the manner of holding elections would include the power to pass a Federal registration law to direct and control the registration of voters in a State.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for just a minute?

Mr. BACON. I will yield for a question. I want to say to the Senator I wish to cover a good deal of ground and it will be very difficult for me to do so unless I am permitted to present my argument with some degree of continuity.

Mr. NELSON. I wanted to propound just one question.

Mr. BACON. I would very much prefer if the Senator would wait, but I will hear him now.

Mr. NELSON. The only question I wanted to propound to the Senator was simply this: Whether the Federal registration board, if it were established, would not be bound by the laws of Georgia in respect to the qualifications of voters?

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly. I have said that before, and I have read what the qualification was as prescribed in Georgia. I have shown that it was a qualification extremely broad, one in which the registrars would have almost unlimited discretion in their decision. The point I was making was that with that unlimited discretion, with that broad provision in the constitution, with registrars who are influenced by political bias as they doubtless would be appointed by partisan political Federal officials under a statute prompted by political consideration and to advance political ends, it would be in their power to register almost every man in the State, and it would only be the penitentiary convict who would probably be excluded.

I have no doubt the same thing is true as to provisions in other State constitutions, and I am going to have something to say before I get through, if I do not weary the Senate, as to the conditions in other States different from those which afflict us, which may give them some little pause as to whether it is a safe thing that the States shall be deprived of their right to determine not simply the technical qualification of electors, but the practical question of who shall vote, and whether the Federal Government shall assert and exercise the power to practically control the question as to who shall go to the ballot box in those States.

I recognize, Mr. President, the fact that that is the existing law as to Representatives, and I shall not omit before I get through to give reasons, satisfactory to myself at least, why, if it is a law as to Representatives, it should not be extended so as to include the election of Senators. But it does not apply simply in reference to registrars and the enactment of a registration law. It goes further. It includes the right to appoint supervisors; and how are they appointed? I can only call attention to the law as it existed upon the statute books for 23 years. They are under that law appointed in a city of 20,000 inhabitants upon the suggestion or complaint of any two citizens of that vast number of people; and in a whole congressional district any 10 men, regardless of who they are, could go before a judge of the Federal court and upon their simple statement that they thought there was need for these supervisors by reason of anticipations of difficulty which they apprehended, it was the duty of the judge to open the court and to immediately appoint supervisors of election with powers which I have not the time here to enumerate. The powers of these supervisors prescribed in the law occupied pages in the statute books—powers conferred on Federal officers alien to the people, political partisans, doubtless, in most cases, with power to control those elections at every poll and every precinct in every particular, to stand there as the watchers, the supervisors, the controllers, the directors of how that election shall be proceeded with and what shall be done and what shall not be done. I wish I had time to enumerate all the powers of these supervisors. Connected with the powers of supervisors is the provision that marshals and deputy marshals in a number sufficient to man every polling place shall be there with each one of these supervisors, with these judges of election, to carry out their orders, to maintain their authority; and further than that, Mr. President, on their own motion to arrest anyone whom they think to be in any manner opposing the authority of those supervisors and those judges or in any manner interfering with the election, the good order or the progress of it, in all matters with a discretion absolutely unbounded, to arrest any man they saw fit without a warrant, to take him to a commissioner and have him committed for trial or go to jail in the absence of bond.

Then, Mr. President, in those election laws there was a chief supervisor, one of the district, or of any designated area of territory, whose duty it was to receive all these complaints, and in the case of the election of Representatives to gather up all the testimony he could find against the validity of the election and to submit and send it to the Clerk of the House of Representatives to be used there in the contest which would arise out of it; and with penal provisions, section after section, prescribing that if a citizen at that election did this thing or that thing or the other thing he should be liable for trial before a Federal court with heavy penalty and fine and imprisonment.

Mr. President, to anyone who is familiar with the manner in which elections are conducted in this country there was under that law the most unbounded opportunity, not only for cruelty and oppression but for the tyrannical domination of the people and the arbitrary control of them in the exercise of the elective franchise.

Mr. President, not only so, but the power under the expression "manner of election" is not confined to a registration law; it is not confined to registrars; it is not confined to supervisors; it is not confined to deputy marshals, but goes further and gives the power to provide that the Army of the United States shall be at those polls, for the purpose of upholding the authority of the supervisors and judges of election, and of the marshals where the marshals' authority of itself was not sufficient; and for more than 20 years it was upon the statute book that the Army of the United States could be called upon to go to the polls for the purpose of preserving the peace.

The power exists now to pass such laws as to Representatives. If we adopt this joint resolution as it has been amended by the Sutherland amendment the power will exist in Congress, in the case of the election of Senators by the people, to appoint these Federal registrars, supervisors, and judges of election, with their authority supported by marshals and deputy marshals and, if need be, the soldiers of the Army.

Not only so, Mr. President, but in the case of Senators there can also be in the law a provision for a returning board under the words "manner of election," not only power to supervise the election, but certainly the power also to determine the result of the election. When under that law a Senator claiming an election comes to this body he will bring with him, not the certificate of the governor of his State but the certificate of an officer appointed by a judge of the Federal court, probably an officer not a citizen of the State, that such and such a man was elected as a Senator from the State of Florida or from the State of Maryland. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] shakes his head, but good lawyer as he is he can not show to the contrary. I am not surprised that the statement I have made is disturbing to anyone who considers it.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I do not think any registration board, any certification board, any marshal, or supervisor can change the suffrage laws of my State.

Mr. BACON. Oh, who said they could?

Mr. RAYNER. You can not do anything contrary to the laws of my State. If I thought that I would not vote for it.

Mr. BACON. I am not now talking about the laws of Maryland in fixing the qualifications of voters. I am not talking about the laws of any other State in regard to such qualifications. I am recognizing that each State has a right to prescribe the qualifications of its voters. I do not dispute that. That is undoubtedly so. But the point I am making is that with the power to create a registration law, to create registrars, to create supervisors, authorize marshals at the polls, to authorize soldiers to support those supervisors and those marshals at the polls, and for a returning board to say who has been elected; I care not what the law of the State is as to the qualifications, these supervisors, these judges of the elections, these returning boards become the judges of it, and it can be perverted by them and the will of the people defeated by permitting persons to vote whom the law intends to exclude.

Mr. RAYNER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. Can not all that be done under the fifteenth amendment?

Mr. BACON. No; by no means.

Mr. RAYNER. Just one minute; I have not finished my question. Does not the fifteenth amendment provide, and if it did not it would be the same thing, that we may pass every law necessary to carry out the terms of that amendment?

Mr. BACON. I am not going to discuss, certainly not in detail, the question as to what can be done under the fifteenth amendment. I am going to discuss what can be done under the Sutherland amendment, which could not be done even under the fifteenth amendment without the Sutherland amendment. I submit it as a proposition so manifest that it is almost difficult to discuss it, that under the fifteenth amendment the Federal Government would have no right to pass a registration law, under the fifteenth amendment the Federal Government would have no right to pass a law appointing supervisors, under the fifteenth amendment the Federal Government would have no right to pass a law creating a returning board to certify who was elected and who was not elected. I am not going into the wide field, Mr. President, as to what we may do under the fifteenth amendment. I am only going into it so as to show what we could not do under the fifteenth amendment in the absence of the Sutherland amendment.

Of course we are beating the air if we are limiting ourselves simply to the question as to whether or not it can be done under the fifteenth amendment. If it can be done under the fifteenth amendment, the Sutherland amendment is not needed. If it can be done under the fifteenth amendment, none of the election laws passed under the fourth section of the first article were needed. The great body of the lawmakers of this country who enacted those drastic election laws, in the enactment of those laws pronounced as strongly as they could that the fifteenth amendment did not of itself give them the power, and the Supreme Court, in the Siebold case and in other cases, distinctly put their ruling upon the ground that the power to pass those election laws was a power derived from the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution.

Of course there are other provisions of the law found in the sections in the Revised Statutes numbered five thousand and odd which are not based upon that, but those provisions of the law are made applicable and put in force by reason of the fact that they can be applied to the election laws and made of service in the enforcement of the election laws. In the absence of the provision of the fourth section of the first article the election laws could not have been passed. They are found in the Revised Statutes in the two thousand range, I have forgotten the exact number, beginning from section two thousand and odd and running on page after page. If those election laws had not been passed the particular laws to which the Senator from Maryland refers could not have been made applicable and put in practical effect as they were in controlling the election of Representatives in enforcing the terms of those election laws.

Now, Mr. President, Senators say with great earnestness that the Sutherland amendment is not a change in the Constitution, that we are simply using the same words which are there now; that we are simply making them applicable to the changed conditions where Senators will be elected by the direct vote of the people, and that it is in fact no change in the law. The change in the law I say is this:

In the first place, the election laws which have heretofore been passed were laws limited exclusively to elections of Representatives and were so denominated. In the second place, no one can dispute the fact that with the elections of Senators by the legislature, although the law is the same in language as that with reference to the election of Representatives, the exercise of the power is altogether different in the election of Senators. In the election of Representatives there is the power which I have recited to pass these election laws—the power to control elections, the power to register the voters, the power to determine who shall be registered, the power to determine who shall be the supervisors of that election, the power to put marshals at the polls to supervise those elections, the power to bring the Army of the United States to maintain those marshals, and there is finally the power to have a returning board to say who have been elected.

Under the present law as it stands, those powers do not exist in practical effect as to the election of a Senator; and yet if we make the election by a direct vote of the people and apply the same law, all those powers with reference to the election of a Representative will then be applicable to the election of a Senator, and it is just as great a change as if there had been an independent enactment to that effect.

Mr. President, I recognize another fact. It is urged with great earnestness that that is the law with reference to Representatives and that if we have direct vote by the people it ought to be the law with reference to Senators. I want to give some reasons why it should not be.

In the first place I will call to the attention of the Senate the fact that the fourth section of the first article as it has been construed, and as I grant it is capable of being construed, is an utter perversion of the intent and purpose of the framers of the Constitution. The framers of the Constitution, Mr. President, never had it in their minds in the most remote degree that the Federal Government should ever exercise a control over the regulation of elections as it has since been exercised, and as it has been determined by the Supreme Court they had a right to exercise, and I will go further and say as a legitimate construction of the words "manner of election" will permit it to be exercised. I want to call attention to what was said in the debates in the different States at the time the question of the adoption of the Constitution was under consideration, to show that such a thought was never in the minds of the framers of the Constitution and was never in the minds of the States when they adopted the Constitution. I am happy to say, Mr. President, that the strongest utterances, or among the strongest utterances, on this subject are States which are not Southern States but Northern States.

The question of negro suffrage was in nobody's mind or anticipation. The question of the effect of slavery or the institution of slavery was not in any man's mind, because at that time every State in the Union except one was a slave State, and that one was Massachusetts, in which there was a dispute as to whether or not slavery existed in it. Every other State at the time of the adoption of the Constitution was a slave State. So this consideration of the existence of slavery had no influence upon the various conventions when they made the announcements which I am about to read. Slavery was not for a long time after that abolished in the various Northern States.

If I recollect aright, even in the State of New York slavery existed until the year 1828. So it had no reference to the question of slavery or the presence of the negro. Yet, Mr. President, those hardy people, composing those 13 States, scattered as they were, out of the sphere of influence of any central power as they were, with no great predominating and inflaming questions to raise section against section, were each jealous of the right to forever control their own internal affairs, and especially in relation to the question of suffrage.

Mr. President, I will begin with the State of South Carolina. The State of South Carolina in its convention adopted the Constitution on the 23d of May, 1788. It was not among the first to adopt it by any means. The first State was Delaware, the second was Pennsylvania, and the third New Jersey, or the reverse of that. I have forgotten which, and the fourth was my own State. South Carolina did not adopt it until May 23, 1788, and in adopting the Constitution it used these words with reference to this particular fourth section of the first article. I want to say to Senators, go through the debates in the various conventions and you will find that the most seriously contested question in all of those conventions was as to whether the Federal Government should have the right to exercise any power over elections within the States, and all these States all adopted it with reservations.

The State of South Carolina said this in its articles of adoption:

> And whereas it is essential to the preservation of the rights reserved to the several States, and the freedom of the people, under the operation of a General Government that the right of prescribing the manner, time, and places of holding the elections to the Federal Legislature, should be forever inseparably annexed to the sovereignty of the several States: This convention doth declare that the same ought to remain to all posterity a perpetual and fundamental right in the local, exclusive of the interference of the General Government, except in cases where the legislatures of the States shall refuse or neglect to perform and fulfill the same according to the tenor of said Constitution.

Before I read the others I am going to say that, as in the case of South Carolina, that was the exception made as to all of them, that was the exception made by the most earnest advocates of the adoption of the Constitution, and none of the States, with one exception that I am going to cite hereafter, would go further than that. It was natural that there should be the apprehension that the States themselves might not elect Representatives, that they might not pass a law for the election of Representatives, and therefore it was important that the Federal Government should have that power in case the States failed to exercise it. They had just had an experience with a Confederation, in which the States were bound together only by a loose rope of sand, and they did not know when they enacted this Constitution whether the States, in giving their adherence, would be strong and earnest in their desire for a maintenance of the Union. They wanted it fixed so that, if the States should fail to provide a means by which Representatives could be elected, the Federal Government itself should have that opportunity in order that, as recited in all of these various resolutions and as stated by the Senator from New York in his address the other day, the Government might be saved from dissolution. Now, I will read, Mr. President, the resolution of Virginia, June 26, 1788, in adopting the Constitution:

> That Congress shall not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, or either of them, except when the legislature of any State shall neglect, refuse, or be disabled by invasion or rebellion to prescribe the same.

North Carolina in the act of 1789 ratified the Constitution in the same language that Virginia did, each of them expressing the same idea, that this dangerous grant of power in the Federal Government was only to provide against the contingency that the States themselves should refuse to exercise it. North Carolina was reluctant to vest the Federal Government with this and other powers, and delayed the act of adoption. Rhode Island was the last to adopt the Constitution, and North Carolina was next to the last.

Now, I come to New York, where, as the Senator from that State who sits before me knows, there was a desperate opposition to the adoption of the Constitution, and where this very provision in the Constitution was one of the great stumbling blocks in the way of its adoption. I have what the great State of New York said in its act of adoption, July 26, 1788. After reciting various things which the convention thought ought to be included in the Constitution for the protection of the rights of the people in the various States, and also fundamental rights belonging to the people upon which the Federal Government should not be allowed to encroach, it continued—New York ratified the Constitution on the 26th of July, 1788—and uses this language:

> Under these impressions—

Those which it had previously recited—

> Under these impressions and declaring that the rights aforesaid can not be abridged or violated, and that the explanations aforesaid are consistent with the said Constitution, and in confidence that the amendments which shall have been proposed to the said Constitution shall receive an early and mature consideration, we, the said delegates * * * do by these presents assent to and ratify the said Constitution.
> In full confidence, nevertheless, that until a convention shall be called and convened for proposing amendments to the Constitution * * * that the Congress will not make or alter any regulation in this State respecting the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives unless the legislature in this State shall neglect or refuse to make laws or regulations for the purpose, or from any circumstances be incapable of making the same, and that in those cases such power will duly be exercised until the legislature of this State shall make provisions in the premises.

Thus spoke New York. Rhode Island, when after more than two years' delay she finally ratified the Constitution on June 26, 1790, used the same language as did the State of New York, only stronger.

Pennsylvania said in the article adopting the Constitution:

> That Congress shall not have power to make or alter regulations concerning the time, place, and manner of electing Senators and Representatives, except in case of neglect or refusal by the State to make regulations for the purpose, and then only for such time as such neglect or refusal shall continue.

The State of Massachusetts on February 6, 1789, in its act of adoption used this language:

> That Congress do not exercise the powers vested in them by the fourth section of the first article, but in cases when a State shall neglect or refuse to make the regulations therein mentioned, or shall make regulations subversive of the rights of the people to a free and equal representation in Congress, agreeably to the Constitution.

That is the only State that has a qualification in asserting this right claimed by all of the States, and yet you will observe that, even though it had that qualification, it was not satisfied with the broad grant of power conveyed by the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution, but desired that the power should be restricted in such a way that the right of the State to control its own internal affairs and to decide as to what was to the interest of its people in guarding their institutions should not be infringed upon by the Federal Government. In order that their rights should not be invaded by the Federal Government, the convention which ratified and adopted the Constitution went on further in the same connection and said:

> And the convention do, in the name and in behalf of the people of this Commonwealth, enjoin it upon their Representatives in Congress at all times, until the alterations and provisions aforesaid have been considered agreeably to the fifth article of said Constitution, to exert all their influence and use all reasonable and legal methods to obtain a ratification of said alterations and provisions, in such manner as is provided in said article.

They adopted the Constitution with the distinct provision that there should be efforts made to procure amendments which should cover this particular point and guard the State in this particular.

New Hampshire, when it ratified the Constitution, June 21, 1788, made a recommendation in the same language as did Massachusetts.

Thus we have it, Mr. President, with nearly all of the States—some of these records are lost and can not be found—but so far as can be ascertained, in all of these States this particular provision of the Constitution was challenged, and was only acceded to upon the assurance that they felt that it would only be used to the extent mentioned for the purpose of guarding against the possibility that the States themselves might not exercise the power, and in the further confidence that the Constitution should be so amended as to restrict it to that.

Not only so, Mr. President, but the great commentators of that day, the men who engaged in the effort to have the people of the United States adopt the Constitution, time and again repeated, reiteration upon iteration, that that was the only purpose of the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution, simply to guard against the possibility that the States themselves might not elect representatives.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. PERCY. Just for one moment. In discussing this power in a speech the other day the Senator from New York stated that Mr. Madison, of Virginia——

Mr. BACON. I am coming to that.

Mr. PERCY. If the Senator from Georgia is coming to that, I will not then interrupt him with a question.

Mr. BACON. Go ahead.

Mr. PERCY. I just want to call attention to the fact that, while Mr. Madison, of Virginia, was an advocate of the exercise and bestowal of this power upon the Federal Government, it was with the same limitation that the States referred to by the Senator from Georgia adopted, namely, that it was an emergent power only.

Mr. BACON. I have it right here.

Mr. PERCY. Go ahead with it. I simply wanted to call the attention of the Senator to the matter.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Mississippi for directing my attention to it. I had some other citations to read, but I will read that directly in this connection.

As correctly stated by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], Mr. Madison was one of the great advocates of the adoption of the Constitution before the Virginia convention, called to decide the question whether or not it should be adopted. In that convention there was grave and serious opposition to its adoption, because of the grant of this and other powers to the Federal Government. That particular power had been challenged, the danger that it would be abused had been pointed out, and Mr. Madison, in defense of that provision, used this language:

> It was found necessary to leave the regulation of these (times, places, and manner) in the first places to the State governments as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution * * *. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments, the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State legislatures, the congressional control will very probably never be exercised.

Mr. John Jay, afterwards Chief Justice of the United States, in discussing in the New York convention this provision of the Constitution, used this language:

> That every government was imperfect unless it had a power of preserving itself. Suppose that by design or accident the States should neglect to appoint the Representatives, certainly there should be some constitutional remedy for this evil. The obvious meaning of the paragraph was that, if this neglect should take place, Congress should have power by law to support the Government, and prevent the dissolution of the Union. He believed this was the design of the Federal convention.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator that I would yield for a question, but manifestly I could not, without breaking the continuity of what I am endeavoring to present as a consecutive argument, now turn aside to discuss some of the numerous questions which I know the very fecund mind of the Senator from Utah would naturally present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I simply wanted to ask the Senator a question, and I could have done so during the time the Senator has been protesting against it.

Mr. BACON. I am not protesting; the Senator does me an injustice.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, have I the Senator's permission to ask a question?

Mr. BACON. If it is a question, yes; but I do not desire to go on to a side argument at this time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question is right on the point the Senator is reading. Does the Senator from Georgia agree with the statement made by Chief Justice Jay with reference to this matter?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have no reason to disagree with the judgment of afterwards Chief Justice Jay. He was giving his opinion as to what was the purpose of it. The Senator, perhaps, did not hear what I said in the beginning, that while that was the intent and the purpose, the construction of the word "manner" was very much broader and could be enforced to a very much greater degree.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, does not the Senator, if he agrees with the language of Chief Justice Jay, agree that it is necessary for the General Government to have this power under some circumstances, namely, in order to preserve the Government from dissolution.

Mr. BACON. I am coming to that very question, if the Senator will permit me. I have that in view. It is a very pertinent question, but I have not quite reached it yet. I will, however, in a moment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.

Mr. BACON. In the Madison Papers Mr. Madison uses this language in regard to this section:

> This was meant to give the National Legislature a power not only to alter the provisions of the State, but to make regulations in case the States should fail or refuse altogether.

That was in the mind of all.

The great apostle of the party to which my distinguished friend from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] belongs, Mr. Hamilton, also expressed his idea of this section. Mr. Hamilton, while he was not one of the most influential and potential men in the framing of the Constitution, because there were many things in it which were at variance with his ideas of what should be in it, was afterwards one of the most urgent and ardent and effective advocates of the adoption of the Constitution, and he contributed papers, with Mr. Madison, which are the most illuminating upon that subject of the arguments of that day. In the fifty-eighth number of the Federalist Mr. Hamilton used this language:

> They (the convention) have submitted the regulation of elections for the Federal Government in the first instance to the local administrations, which, in ordinary cases and when no improper views prevail, may be both more convenient and more satisfactory; but they have reserved to the national authority a right to interpose whenever extraordinary circumstances might render that interposition necessary to its safety.

Having been a member of the convention in New York, having heard all of the discussions, while using different language, he had doubtless in his mind the exact meaning which Chief Justice Jay had attributed to it and which was embodied in the resolutions of the convention itself. I think I am correct in saying that he was a member of the New York convention. I will ask the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] as to that.

Mr. ROOT. Yes.

Mr. BACON. That was my recollection.

Now, Mr. President, we come to the question which the Senator from Utah propounded to me, and which I was about to reach without the suggestion on his part. The question of the Senator from Utah is this: Is not this a necessary power—the power thus to guard the Government against the danger of dissolution by reason of the States' failure to provide a method by which Representatives shall be elected to take their places in the other branch of Congress. I will say, Mr. President, that, with the conditions as they existed then, it was a proper provision to put into the Constitution, for, as I have previously said, there was reason then to apprehend that the States might be negligent in their performance of that duty; that they might grow cold in their allegiance to the new Government, as they had grown indifferent to the ligaments which bound them to the Confederation, and that for that reason it was proper that there should be such a provision; but is there a Senator, is there a man in the whole United States, who believes for a moment that it is possible at this day that a condition of affairs will arise where the States and the people within the States and the ambitious aspirants within the States will leave undone that important duty? Is it possible to conceive that the time will ever come when the States will not have laws by which Representatives can be elected and sent to Congress, or that there will be a condition under which they would be unrepresented in Congress, nonparticipants in its affairs and nonrecipients of its benefits?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BACON. I do, for a question. I would prefer, if the Senator wants to argue the proposition, that he wait until I get through, and I will give him all the opportunity he desires.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I simply want to say to the Senator that under existing conditions the Senator is undoubtedly correct; but is the Senator or anybody else wise enough to know that in all the time to come this power may never be necessary and that in all future time no State will neglect this duty? It may be true, under existing circumstances, that it will not be done, but none of us is able to see what the future may produce, and is it not wise to preserve this power against the day of need?

Mr. BACON. As is suggested to me by my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], we would be very glad to have that power if, as was suggested in a number of the ratifying conventions, it was limited to that case. I would be willing to provide that the Federal Government should have the right to exercise the power to prescribe the manner of holding such elections in all cases where the States neglected to do so. That is the point, namely, that as originally contemplated it was limited to the case where the States neglected the duty; it had no other purpose in view, and if it had been extended beyond that the Constitution would undoubtedly have been rejected. Suppose, instead of the language as found in section 4 of the first article, the reading of that section had been different. The Senator will bear in mind what I before read of the very strenuous opposition of the States from the topmost New England States down to the extreme South, in regard to the control by the Federal Government of the manner of elections within the States. But suppose, instead of the language found in section 4, Article I, this had been the reading of the section:

> SEC. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations for the purpose of keeping order at the polls, insuring pure elections, and enforcing the right of every person to vote who may be deemed by the Federal Government eligible thereto under the law, and for that purpose shall have power to appoint registrars and supervisors of elections in the several States, with marshals and soldiers to enforce their authority.

Does the Senator think, does any Senator think, for a moment, in view of the sensitiveness of the States at that time as to any encroachment of the Federal Government upon the question of prescribing who should vote or who should not vote in the elections in the States, that the Constitution with such a provision in it would have been adopted by a single State of the 13 States? Yet under the broad construction which it has received by Congress and by the Supreme Court, under the broad construction of which it is capable, and under the application of it in the enactment of law in a manner not then contemplated, that section, as I now suggest, is just exactly the same in effect as the Sutherland amendment. The States would never have adopted the Constitution with section 4 of Article I written out plainly that way.

What conclusion do I draw from that, Mr. President? The conclusion I draw from that is this: That it is no argument to say that that is the law with reference to the election of Representatives and that therefore it should be the law with reference to the election of Senators. In view of what I have submitted there can be no doubt of the fact, no possible question of the fact, that that was not the original contemplation of the Constitution; and if any change is to be now made at all the power in the Federal Government as to the control of the manner of electing Representatives should be limited in this particular, and the power should not be extended where it does not now exist. That is my argument, that is the response I make to that; and I conceive, Mr. President, that it is a conclusive one.

I intended to do it at a later stage in the argument, but my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] makes a suggestion to me which I will carry out now. Mr. President, this resolution providing for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people can be adopted if those who profess to be its friends will frame this particular provision in a way that will not make it dangerous to us. We will not go to the extent of saying that we will not agree to this amendment unless it is taken out altogether, but we will go to the extent of saying that we will agree to it if it is limited to the cases where the State fails to act, as it was originally intended, as shown by all these utterances by the various conventions.

Let it be so limited that in the direct election of Senators by the people the States shall have the right to prescribe the times, manner, and places of holding the elections, and that the Federal Government shall have the right to make such regulations only in case the States should fail to make the necessary regulations prescribing the manner of holding such elections.

Now, Mr. President, there is a plain proposition. Make that change and I pledge, so far as this side of the Chamber is concerned, that joint resolution will be adopted for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people. Preserve, if you please, the right of the Federal Government to fix the time. I think that is right and proper. Then, as to the manner, limit the power of the Federal Government as the framers of the Constitution intended it to be limited, and as the conventions which adopted it understood it to be limited, to cases where the States fail to make the necessary regulations. Do that and our contention immediately ceases.

Mr. President, I think this is a question which concerns all the States and is not limited to any particular section; and yet we can not shut our eyes to the fact that there is a large section of this country which is peculiarly interested in it, a large section of this country to which it is of the most vital importance that the States should control the question of suffrage within their borders. I want to say, Mr. President, in this presence that there is no question concerning public affairs, either in the National Government or in a State government, in which the people of the South are so vitally interested and in which the people of the South are so unalterably fixed, come weal come woe, as their determination to preserve white supremacy, and it is no use to mince words on the subject.

Mr. President, we have fought the battle, as I said the other day, through the darkest night through which a people ever passed. We have rescued our civilization by the sacrifices and the trials which we then endured. We have not only rescued the civilization of the South, but we have rescued this entire Nation from the destruction of civilization which would have undoubtedly ensued if a Haiti had been made of the South. With civilization and with social order overthrown in the South, the deadly poison would have extended to the whole country.

Mr. President, I approach that question from that standpoint. If that standpoint is wrong, then all I have to say is wrong, because I base it all on that so far as it concerns my particular section. But then I want to say further that I do not consider the importance of this question as limited to my section. Constitutions are not made for to-day. They are not made for to-morrow or a decade or a century, but they are made for the life of a nation. They are not made for peace only; they are made for storm, and no man can tell in the years which are to come, in the centuries which I hope are to pass with this Government still pursuing its grand career, there is no telling when the time will come when this question of the right of the States to control their elections will be a vital question to other than the States in the southern section of this country.

Sir, there are great forces at work—great forces of unrest. No man knows what the next decade will bring, much less what the next century will bring, and the greatest bulwark that the people of this Nation can have against the dangers from the upheaval of those great forces is in the check which there is in the control by each State of its own affairs. So if there is a predominating influence for evil in any section, it can not outweigh the counterbalance in the lesser part, but that each, a separate entity, may, by controlling matters within its own borders, hold in check that predominating influence for evil. And so I say, while the question is acute now with us, it is a question which in the future may be acute with some other sections.

Mr. President, Senators from the West are nervous about the yellow peril. They do not, however, think it possible now that the question of suffrage for Asiatics can ever be presented to them or to this country, because they are not now even allowed to be made citizens. But is any man within my hearing ready for a moment to say that the proposition of Asiatics ever being forced as voters upon the people of the western coast is more impossible or more unthinkable than was the probability in the year 1860 that in eight years by an act of the Federal Government a whole section of this country should be submitted to the dangers of the domination of a race of people with only the slavery through thousands of years behind them, who were of the lowest alien race, and who had none of the capacity or intelligence or experience or character essential for government? Does any man think that the possibility of a change which shall confront the western people with the question of the right of that Asiatic element to vote—is there any man here who will say that the possibility of that compares with what was recognized as the possibility in 1860 that that would occur which did occur within the short space of eight years?

Mr. President, I hope Senators will not consider me as endeavoring to stir up feeling on sectional or racial questions. But yet we have the problem with us; we have the dangers confronting us, and we can not shut our eyes to them, and we must guard against them. It will not do to say that the thing is settled. The only argument that can be used in support of the proposition to ignore these safeguards is that the day of danger from this cause has passed, or, as said by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], that the issue is dead. I shall, sir, in reply call attention to the attitude occupied within a very short period in the past upon this question by the influential dominant party of the country.

In time of peace it is hard to believe that there will be war. It is hard to look upon a peaceful ocean and realize the fact that on the day before the storm had lashed it in fury, and still more difficult to realize that on the next day it will be seething in a tempest. With other Senators who now sit here I have seen, only a few years ago, Mount Vesuvius when it was as peaceful as any mountain in Pennsylvania or in West Virginia, although before then it had known its days of fiery wrath. And yet since that recent day when we have seen it thus peaceful, mighty forces have worked within it. There has been since then a great convulsion within its vast abyss which has blown off a third of the upper cone of that mountain, blown it to the very skies, and the people who in fancied security had settled at the base of that mountain and had there builded their villages and had planted their orchards and their vineyards upon its slopes, fled in terror from homes all engulfed in a storm of molten lava.

With such convulsions as we have been through, such dangers as we have had to face, such troubles as we have had to endure—are we now to neglect all opportunity, neglect all precaution, upon the simple ground that there is now peace?

I shall have to call attention to some things, in no spirit of unkindness, in no sectional spirit, but as a justification, as a reason why we can not submit, or some of us, at least, to a change in our fundamental law which will give to the Federal Government the control of our internal affairs.

Before doing so, however, and before I pass from the subject I have been discussing, I desire to suggest one thought to Senators. Upon what possible ground can there be a justification of the proposition that the Federal Government ought, for the purpose of securing free elections and purity of elections, to have the power to interfere and control those elections by registrars and supervisors and marshals and deputy marshals and soldiers at the polls and with persons chosen to certify the result of the elections? Upon what ground can it possibly be defended except upon the ground, first, that the States themselves have not the intelligence and the virtue to decide this question for themselves; second, that the country at large in its collective capacity has an intelligence and a virtue not found in an individual State? Does any man think for a moment that when the Constitution was framed and the Government was formed any such thought was in the minds of people? And, Mr. President, if there is any Senator here who thinks that while it might not have been true in the first instance, it is true now, I scout the proposition and I would trample it under my feet.

Does the Senator representing any great State—New York or Pennsylvania or Illinois or Massachusetts—think for a moment that the people in his own State are incapable of determining what is best for the people of that State, incapable of maintaining free institutions, incapable of maintaining the virtue and public character of their people, and that the collective intelligence and collective virtue of the people of the United States are superior to their own and should be, therefore, invoked to control them in that which they are not able to manage for themselves?

Why, Mr. President, the very suggestion of it is abhorrent, and what is justly claimed to the contrary for such communities as those States which I have named can with equal right be claimed for every other State; and so far as I am concerned, sir, I will never agree, cost what it will, to sanction any provision which shall contain within it necessarily the recognition of any such monstrous heresy as that, and yet there can be no other ground upon which the policy and duty of Federal interference can be placed; no other ground.

The people of Massachusetts, the people of New York, the people of Illinois are not the guardians of the people in Georgia. They are not the people who are to determine what should happen within it in order to protect those within her borders or to safeguard her institutions. Mr. President, it is the opposite of that proposition, it is the ignoring of that proposition, it is the denial of the power and ability of people within the States to control their own affairs that has led to all the great troubles, the great sacrifices, the great tragedies in this country.

I do not hesitate to say, Mr. President, that the greatest tragedy in the nineteenth century, if not the greatest tragedy considered from some standpoints of all the ages, was the Civil War in America—greater than the tragedies of the wars of Napoleon or of Hannibal or of Cæsar, because they were wars between alien peoples. But our Civil War was a war of people of the same race and blood on each opposing side, the same kinships, the same family—fathers, brothers, sons—who went against each other to war; and that a million men of the same race and blood, the same ancestry, and the same destiny should have, in that fratricidal war, found untimely graves, is the greatest tragedy not only of the nineteenth century, but of all time. Point to a parallel, if you can. And what brought it about? Mr. President, we know that while it was complicated with other questions and the issue was at times obscurely stated, the existence of African slavery caused the war, and without the existence of African slavery no war would have occurred; and I assert here, and I challenge contradiction, that in all probability, with almost certainty, slavery would have been driven from the United States peacefully and by the consent and cooperation of all sections if it had not been for the intermeddling of people in other States, who undertook to say what was right and proper in States within which they did not live.

Why do I say that? I can give a number of reasons, but I point to one, the correctness of which is easily ascertained. Let any man go and read the debates in Congress up to the thirties, and he will find that the Southern Senators and Representatives were apologists of slavery and not its defenders. He will find that they apologized for it on the ground that they had inherited it; that it had been put upon them against their will, or without their agency, rather; that a large proportion of it was in the influx of slaves from the Northern States, where they had not abolished slavery peremptorily, but where they had fixed the date when the abolition of slavery should commence, giving ample time in the meantime for all the slaves to be carried South and sold.

They were apologetic of it, I say. All the great leaders of the South were against slavery. In my own State, the very first of all colonies to so provide, had in its law a prohibition against slavery. Jefferson, Randolph, all the great sages of the South were opposed to slavery, and it was not until the great meddling, the great interference by fanatics in other States, attacking the institution, heaping all obloquy upon those who were so unfortunate as to be within its grasp—it was not until then, until this interference, that the apologetic tone naturally changed according to all human impulse into one of defense of the institution, and finally into one of defiance of those who were thus attacking it, and out of that grew that war, that terrible tragedy, the greatest of all times, with a third of the country utterly desolated, with a vacant place at every hearthstone, and a million of young men in untimely graves. That was the direct consequence of the "holier than thou" doctrine and practice. It is in resistance to that doctrine that I oppose the policy or the right of Federal interference in the control by the States of their own elections.

Now, the Senators say that the time is passed; that that issue is dead, and that there is no longer danger of Federal interference. I have occupied so much time that I will not carry out the intention I had of going through this particular branch of the question in detail. I must allude to it, however. We have had within the last 30 years great controversies and great struggles upon this very issue. There first arose—I will not say there first arose—but there was in the Forty-fifth Congress so great an opposition to this Federal interference that the Democratic House at that time felt itself justified in putting upon the Army appropriation bill a provision which prohibited troops at the polls in connection with the election laws. It passed the House of Representatives, and, Mr. President, if I had time I would like to call the roll of the great men of that day who were engaged in that controversy, some of whom I see before me, who were then Members of the House, men who contended on the one side and the other side. The position was taken that the Federal election law was a great invasion of the rights of the people to the free exercise of the franchise and of the right of the State to determine in what way that franchise should be exercised. They said that unless the Government would withdraw its troops, unless it should put in the law that it could not have troops at the polls in the support of the Federal election laws, the Army appropriation bill should not pass.

Mr. President, of course there was great criticism upon the fact that supplies to the Government were denied, but Mr. Hewitt, of New York, who reported the bill to the House, defended it upon the ground that it had been true of our ancestors, that they had secured the great rights of civil liberty by denying supplies unless concessions in favor of that liberty were permitted to them by the Crown. And so it passed the House and came to this Senate. The Senate, being Republican, refused to pass the bill with that provision upon it which took the troops from the polls in support of Federal supervisors, and it went into conference, and after an interchange it finally failed in conference and an extra session of Congress had to be called, and in that extra session of Congress there was again a great struggle.

The Army appropriation bill in the House again had that same provision put upon it. It again came to the Senate, and again the Republican Senate struck it out, and it went into conference. I want to read, Mr. President, the names of the Senators who took that position—the Senators who recognized the fact that the question of the right of the people to control their own elections was so grave a question that rather than surrender it they would stop the wheels of the Government.

I want to say, first, Mr. President, that among those Representatives in the House who took that position were distinguished men who afterwards came to the Senate, and I read the names of some of them. There were Messrs. Blackburn, of Kentucky; Kenna, of West Virginia; Vance, of North Carolina; Carlisle, of Kentucky; and MONEY, of Mississippi; and when it came to the Senate there were Senators of historic names who stood for that proposition and who said that before they would agree that the Federal Government, under the elections laws and with the use of troops at the polls, should be allowed to control elections in the States, they would refuse the supplies to the Government for the support of the Army. The Senators who then spoke and voted that way in the Senate were Bailey, of Tennessee; Barnum, of Connecticut; Bayard, of Delaware; Beck, of Kentucky; Butler, of South Carolina; Cockrell, of Missouri; Coke, of Texas; Davis, of West Virginia; Dennis, of Maryland; Eaton, of Connecticut; Garland, of Arkansas; Gordon, of Georgia; Grover, of Oregon; Harris, of Tennessee; Hereford, of West Virginia; Hill, of Georgia; Jones, of Florida; Kernan, of New York; Lamar, of Mississippi; McCreery, of Kentucky; McDonald, of Indiana; McPherson, of New Jersey; Maxey, of Texas; Merrimon, of North Carolina; Morgan, of Alabama; Ransom, of North Carolina; Saulsbury, of Delaware; Shields, of Missouri; Thurman, of Ohio; Voorhees, of Indiana; Wallace, of Pennsylvania; Whyte, of Maryland; and Withers, of Virginia.

Mr. President, these be great names, illustrious names, not only in the Democratic Party but in American history; and I invoke their names to-day in justification and support of the position I take here.

Sir, can it be conceived for a moment that these great men, these illustrious men, who were willing to say that the wheels of the Government should be stopped before these election laws and troops at the polls should be allowed to continue to interfere with the elections within the States—can it be said that if they were here to-day standing in the places which we in only a measure can hope to worthily fill, they would vote to extend that provision of the law to the election of Senators, when in its enforcement in the election of Representatives they said, "We will stop the wheels of the Government before we will permit it?"

Mr. President, there is no escape from the proposition. Can it be said for a moment that Senators would have taken so drastic action as that, these great men—for they were great men, and I am afraid we of this day can not furnish their equals—can it be said for a moment these great men would be willing in any manner to extend this dangerous power in the Federal Government or consent to the possibility of its exercise in any additional sphere where it does not now have it?

Mr. President, that did not end the controversy. There were other instances in which the struggle was waged. I will not, however, now stop to recall, or rather to recite, them, because I feel that time will not permit; but when Senators say there is no danger, when Senators say that the time for such issues is past, that the issue is dead, I want to call attention to the fact that the law of 1870 for the control of elections at the polls in the States, a law coupled with another which had been previously passed, which put it within the power to send troops to maintain the authority of these supervisors and registrars and deputy marshals at the polls—I want to call attention to the fact that that law was not repealed until the year 1893, and that it was repealed by the only Democratic Government that has existed since the war. There has been but one term of Congress in which the Democrats had the Executive and each branch of the legislative Government, and that law was repealed by that Congress, and when it was repealed every single Republican voted against the repeal; and yet we are told the issue is dead.

Prior to that repeal, to state it as briefly as possible, in the year 1890 there had been introduced in the other House what was known as the force bill. I want to state another fact. Seeing my learned friend, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], sitting before me reminds me of it. When we are talking about the question whether the thing is dead and belongs to the distant past, and when I am bringing to the attention of the Senate the fact of these recent occurrences, I note that the Senator from Texas, as young as he is, born during the Civil War, was a Member of Congress and recorded his vote in 1893 in favor of the repeal of those Federal election laws. That does not look very much like it was an ancient and antiquated measure, and that the influences which supported those election laws belong to the dead and distant past. I could enumerate a great many others. I see Senators sitting in front of me who were in that House before that time.

But, Mr. President, to recite it briefly, there had been introduced in the House what was known as the force bill, which passed the House after a very acrimonious and heated debate. It came to the Senate and, after possibly the most acrimonious and heated debate which has taken place in the Senate in 30 years past, it was at last defeated by indirection and not by direction. It was defeated simply by the then Senator from Colorado, Mr. Wolcott, moving to proceed to the consideration of the congressional apportionment bill, and while that motion was not debatable any one who will read the RECORD will see in the remarks which were interjected the intensity and heat of those who realized the fact that if that motion prevailed the bill would fail, the bill by which they had set so much store.

Mr. President, it was in that debate when party spirit ran so high and the intention to fix that bill upon the country was so strong that the present Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] submitted a resolution to apply a cloture in this body—not simply a motion, but an elaborate resolution to apply a cloture in this body to cut off the efforts of those Senators who were resisting the measure, so earnest was he in the insistence that the force bill should be passed.

Now, Mr. President, it will not do to say that the debate to which I have alluded when the extra session was forced was one which related simply to the question of the removal of troops from the polls. While there was an extra session by reason of the failure to pass the Army appropriation bill, the burden of that whole debate was that the necessity of the troops at the polls was required in connection with the election laws, which gave to Congress the power and the opportunity to control the manner in which these elections should be had. If Senators will turn to the speech made by Senator Voorhees in the debate, which, of course, I can not stop to quote, they will see a most elaborate discussion in that very controversy of the election laws and each provision and clause of the election laws as they were affected by the use of troops at the polls for their enforcement.

Mr. President, I want to say another thing which will be borne out by anyone who will take the time to examine the debates of that day. While there was a general claim of power and some incidental mention occasionally of disorders in different States, the great burden of the argument through all the months was in that controversy that the Government should have the power to pass a Federal election law, with registrars and supervisors and deputy marshals and troops at the polls, in order that the black vote of the South might be protected in the casting of the ballot. Senators will find not only page after page, but volume after volume, of the congressional debates filled up with that.

Mr. President, I am going to read, just to give an idea of it, an extract from that debate from the then Senator from Maine, Mr. Blaine. I do not do this now from any unkindness or for the purpose of stirring up any feeling, but to show the animus and purpose of those who then advocated the Federal election law, and that we stand on solid ground when we oppose this legislation or when we oppose extending to the Federal Government the power to enact legislation of this kind.

On page 733, volume 9, part 1, Forty-sixth Congress, first session. That was the extra session which had been called because of the fact that the Army appropriation bill had failed in the manner and for the reason I have stated. The sole question being whether or not these laws should be kept upon the books, whether these marshals should be armed with the power of troops, nobody denying that the Federal Government under the fourth section of Article I could do it, the sole question was whether it should be done or whether or not if the Government were to refrain from doing it the supplies should not be stopped from the Army. Here is what Mr. Blaine said about elections in the South. It may be true from the standpoint of some gentlemen, but it nevertheless accounts for the fact that we are not willing that that matter should be adjudged by the Federal Government. Mr. Blaine, in the course of that debate, said:

> What we ask is that Representatives in Congress shall be elected by the free vote of the people of the respective districts, and there has never been such a travesty on truth, there has never been such a satire on fact, there has never been such a pretense to righteousness so utterly confounded by fact and so utterly ridiculed by history as for the Senators on that side to stand up here and demand a free election. Why, that is what we have been struggling for—a free election. There has not been a free election in five Southern States that I can name since the Democrats have had power. There was no more a free election in South Carolina for the Congress now in session than there would be in a mob of violent roughs that had undisputed possession of a poll in the lower wards of the city of New York—not a particle more.

Mr. President, I could quote page after page and volume after volume of just such talk as that. Mr. President, we are not willing—at least I am not willing if the power does exist in the control of Federal election of Representatives—by my vote to give the opportunity to extend that power to be exercised by the Federal Government in the control of the election of Senators.

With the permission of the Senate, I will read one other extract from a Member of the House along the same line just to show that it was not confined to the Senate, coupling it with the statement that it is only one of thousands. In advocating the retention of the Federal election laws to control elections in the Southern States, Representative TAYLOR of Ohio said in the debate in the House:

> There is no need of any antagonism between the North and South, and if the South will secure equal and exact justice to all men of all colors there will be none, and the South will be the great gainer. If this is not done, sooner or later the same causes which brought on the War of the Rebellion will bring on another conflict, the end of which will not be so peaceable as the last. The Anglo-Saxon sense of justice will not permit this injustice to continue very much longer. The iniquitous methods of degrading the colored race in the South must come to an end. An enslavement of 8,000,000 of human beings by indirection, by fraud and perjury, by violence and intimidation, is no better than the slavery we had before the war and will not be allowed to exist very much longer. The colored race rebels, the great North rebels, one-half the Southern States rebel, and one-half the people where these frauds exist rebel against this flagrant and unblushing wrong.

With such views as those thus expressed, who can doubt, when the time came to act, the spirit with which Congress would proceed to enact laws to control elections in the South?

Mr. President, I know some Senators—who do not themselves approve of the resolution with the Sutherland amendment—say that by our votes here we do not determine this question; that we simply put it up to the States to determine it. I have no criticism to make of Senators who take that position, but it is one I can not use in justifying myself in casting a vote different from what I think is the proper vote to be cast by the legislature itself. It was the contemplation and the intention of the Constitution that the proposing of amendments to the Constitution was a function to be carefully exercised by Congress. It was not a matter in which the final determination was thought to be sufficient if three-fourths of the States had that determination. If so, we would have left it to a majority in Congress to propose the amendment, as is done in other matters. But so careful were they to protect even three-fourths of the States against the possibility of deciding unwisely that they said to Congress, Before you can submit to the States to be determined by three-fourths of them the question whether or not this Constitution shall be amended, two-thirds of each of your bodies shall think it ought to be amended. What else can you say as to the purpose in requiring that there shall be two-thirds except that it was the intention that Congress should weigh in its judgment whether or not there should be an amendment to the Constitution, and that if even a majority of them thought there ought to be such an amendment it would still require two-thirds of each House to agree upon it before there should be given to the States the power and the opportunity to decide it, even though three-fourths of them would have to concur before it could be decided in the affirmative?

I think, Mr. President, from my standpoint, that it is not proper for me to vote to submit to the States an amendment of the Constitution which I myself do not approve, and that I can only consistently submit to the legislatures of the States an amendment which I do approve.

I want to suggest one other thought in that connection. Some Senators say that, while they do not approve the resolution with the Sutherland amendment, they will put it up to the legislatures and that they will have a right to determine, and they do not feel that they are at liberty to deny to the legislatures of the States the right to determine the question for themselves. I want to suggest to Senators that when they put up to the States the opportunity to determine as to a constitutional amendment which they themselves do not approve, they run the risk of putting up a proposition which their own legislatures may not approve and which they will vote against, but which other legislatures may force upon them. Then, Mr. President, there comes the question of the responsibility of a Senator who thus by so doing practically defeats the will of his own State.

Mr. President, it is no light matter to amend the Constitution of the United States. It is a matter of sufficient gravity when we pass a statute law which gravely affects the people of the United States, because it is difficult to repeal it, but still it can be repealed. But when we pass a law which changes the Constitution of the United States, we have done that which is practically irrevocable. One-fourth, or a fraction over one-fourth, can defeat a proposed amendment to the Constitution. But when it has been once adopted, however grievous it may be, however tyrannical in its exercise of power it may prove to be, the fraction over one-fourth can not then put themselves back in the same position; it will take a fraction over three-fourths in order to do it.

There is one other thought, Mr. President, recurring to something I have already passed, and then I am going to close. In connection with the suggestion that this is a dead issue, there is one other thought in connection with the peculiar interests that the people of the South have in regard to this matter. I believe it is true that the great mass of the people of the North have changed their minds, and that there is now no general disposition to interfere with the people of the South in the control of their own affairs. Yet I recall that the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in the main address which he made here the other day, stated the fact that there were things done at the South which, in his opinion, ought not to be done, and which, if they continued to do, the Federal Government must exercise the power to prevent; and when in a subsequent short debate I asked for specifications, the pertinent specification, one which he mentioned which relates to this question, was the suppression of the Negro vote.

Now, I am not going to stop to discuss the question which was raised as to whether or not the Senator in his reply meant that Congress could by direct act nullify the statutes of the State in prescribing the qualifications of electors. I am not going to stop to discuss that, but I do say that it does show from so high authority as the Senator from New York that the people of the North—perhaps I should say those belonging to the Republican Party—still have it in their minds that when opportunity comes they will exercise the power, if they have it, to interfere with the elections at the South.

Mr. President, even though it be true that there has been a change in the general feeling of the North on this subject, a general disposition to leave the people of the South to the control of their own affairs, it is a fact not to be forgotten that vast numbers of negroes have gone to the North and that in a half dozen close Northern States the negro vote is most potential and frequently holds the balance of power between the two great political parties.

Whenever the Republicans carry the State of New York by a close vote it is because the negroes have given them their support. The same thing is sometimes true in the great State of Illinois, even with its ordinary majority of over 100,000 Republicans. The same thing is frequently true of Ohio. The same thing is true always in Maryland and Delaware and West Virginia whenever Republicans carry those States.

Mr. President, is it possible for us to shut our eyes to the fact that it is a political necessity to regard the demands of that large voting negro population in these close States? Is it possible for us to shut our eyes to the fact that, however much the people of the North may be disposed to leave to the people of the South the control of their own affairs, the time may come when under the demand of the colored voters in these close States they may again, if they have the power, pass these election laws, having the southern elections in view, to retain their political support? We can not prevent them passing these election laws, if they have the numerical majority, in the case of the election of Representatives. We ourselves put our hands within the manacles as to the election of Senators if we extend to them this power.

Mr. President, it may be true of some Senators that they will support this joint resolution with the Sutherland amendment under a feeling of obligation for one cause and another, when they would prefer that it should not be enacted.

Some persons, Mr. President, must stand in the breach. For myself, with my views as to the danger of this measure, whatever may be the sacrifice, so far as in my power I propose to stand in this breach. I do not propose to consent, Mr. President, by any act of mine to extend the power of the Federal Government in the control of elections in the States. It is too great a price to pay for the election of Senators by direct vote; it is too great a price for my section, particularly; not only because of the vast magnitude of the issues which are involved, but because we already have the selection of Senators there by popular choice. There is not a Southern State in which the Senators are not now selected by choice in a primary election. Therefore we can afford not only to say we will not take it at this price, but we can afford to say we will wait. The time is near at hand when this amendment can be so framed as to relieve it of this objectionable feature.

Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its very kind attention.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

H. R. 30570. An act to authorize the receipt of certified checks drawn on national banks for duties on imports and internal taxes, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 32344. An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest.

The message also announced that the House insists on its amendment to the bill (S. 9903) to authorize the Sheridan Railway & Light Co. to construct and operate railway, telegraph, telephone, electric power, and trolley lines through the Fort Mackenzie Military Reservation, and for other purposes; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HULL of Iowa, Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, and Mr. HAY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 9904) granting certain rights of way on the Fort D. A. Russell Military Reservation at Cheyenne, Wyo., for railroad and county road purposes; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HULL of Iowa, Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, and Mr. HAY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 31237) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the second report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 31856) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GARDNER of Michigan, Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio, and Mr. BURLESON managers at the conference on part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 5453. An act for the relief of the legal representatives of M. N. Swofford, deceased; and

H. R. 26606. An act for the relief of Charles A. Caswell.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRAWFORD in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 31856) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and agree to the further conference asked for by the House of Representatives, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. TILLMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina obtained the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for a moment to enable me to make a conference report? It will take only a moment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota presents a conference report, which will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28406) an act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

On amendments numbered 48, 76, and 82, the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

MOSES E. CLAPP,
P. J. MCCUMBER,
WM. J. STONE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

CHAS H. BURKE,
P. P. CAMPBELL,
JNO. H. STEPHENS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, that it ask for a further conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether the amendment relating to the Colville Indian money has been passed upon by the conference committee.

Mr. CLAPP. That is one of the three amendments upon which the disagreement is based.

Mr. JONES. If this conference report is adopted and the matter goes back to the conferees and the conferees then agree, whatever that agreement may be, I understand there would be no opportunity to discuss that particular amendment, but only to vote upon the report that is made.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true.

Mr. JONES. I really do not like to see it go in that way. I think that the amendment ought to be receded from by the Senate, and I think the matter ought to be discussed somewhat in the Senate, but I do not like——

Mr. CLAPP. I suppose that would be in order if it did not interfere with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who has taken the floor to speak. I certainly do not intend to interfere with his speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would be in order for the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the conference report, if it so desired.

Mr. CLAPP. I know it would be in order, but I would not press it, in view of the Senator from South Carolina having the floor.

Mr. JONES. I know that.

Mr. CLAPP. I think it might be just as well to send the report back to conference.

Mr. JONES. Then I will leave that to the judgment of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I have been out of the Chamber for a moment, and I want to inquire what became of the Colville item in the conference report. Was it retained or stricken out?

Mr. CLAPP. That is one of the three items upon which the conferees have not agreed. It goes back to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate further insist upon its amendments numbered 48, 76, and 82; that it ask for a further conference with the House of Representatives thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. CLAPP, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. STONE the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 31237) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter appearing in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Hereafter the pay and allowances of Army paymasters' clerks shall be the same as provided by law for Navy paymasters' clerks on shore duty, and they shall also be entitled to the same right of retirement with the same retired pay as is now allowed Navy paymasters' clerks: Provided, That Army paymasters' clerks shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate agree to its amendment numbered 23, as amended by the House, with amendments as follows: On page 1 of said amendment as amended, in line 7, strike out the words "State, Territory, and the District of Columbia"; and in line 8 strike out the words "not to exceed one additional officer for each," and strike out the comma which appears at the end of line 8.

On page 2 of said amendment as amended, in line 18, strike out the word "one-fifth" and insert in lieu thereof "one-half," so that the amendment will read: "Upon the request of the governors of the several States and Territories concerned, the President may detach officers of the active list of the Army from their proper commands for duty as inspectors and instructors of the Organized Militia, as follows, namely: Not to exceed one officer for each regiment and separate battalion of infantry, or its equivalent of other troops: Provided, That line officers detached for duty with the Organized Militia under the provisions hereof, together with those detached from their proper commands, under the provisions of law, for other duty the usual period of which exceeds one year, shall be subject to the provisions of section 27 of the act approved February 2, 1901, with reference to details to the staff corps, but the total number of detached officers hereby made subject to these provisions shall not exceed 200: And provided further, That the number of such officers detached from each of the several branches of the line of the Army shall be in proportion to the authorized commissioned strength of that branch; they shall be of the grades first lieutenant to colonel, inclusive, and the number detached from each grade shall be in proportion to the number in that grade now provided by law for the whole Army. The vacancies hereby caused or created in the grade of second lieutenant shall be filled in accordance with existing law, one-half in each fiscal year until the total number of vacancies shall have been filled: Provided, That hereafter vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant occurring in any fiscal year shall be filled by appointment in the following order, namely: First, of cadets graduated from the United States Military Academy during that fiscal year; second, of enlisted men whose fitness for promotion shall have been determined by competitive examination; third, of candidates from civil life between the ages of 21 and 27 years. The President is authorized to make rules and regulations to carry these provisions into effect: Provided, That the Quartermaster's Department is hereby increased by 2 colonels, 3 lieutenant colonels, 7 majors, and 18 captains, the vacancies thus created to be filled by promotion and detail in accordance with section 26 of the act approved February 2, 1901"; and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 49, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter appearing in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Hereafter there shall be attached to the Medical Department a dental corps, which shall be composed of dental surgeons and acting dental surgeons, the total number of which shall not exceed the proportion of one to each thousand of actual enlisted strength of the Army; the number of dental surgeons shall not exceed 60, and the number of acting dental surgeons shall be such as may, from time to time, be authorized by law. All original appointments to the dental corps shall be as acting dental surgeons, who shall have the same official status, pay, and allowances as the contract dental surgeons now authorized by law. Acting dental surgeons who have served three years in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War shall be eligible for appointment as dental surgeons, and, after passing in a satisfactory manner an examination which may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, may be commissioned with the rank of first lieutenant in the dental corps to fill the vacancies existing therein. Officers of the dental corps shall have rank in such corps according to date of their commissions therein and shall rank next below officers of the Medical Reserve Corps. Their right to command shall be limited to the dental corps. The pay and allowances of dental surgeons shall be those of first lieutenants, including the right to retirement on account of age or disability, as in the case of other officers: Provided, That the time served by dental surgeons as acting dental or contract dental surgeons shall be reckoned in computing the increased service pay of such as are commissioned under this act. The appointees as acting dental surgeons must be citizens of the United States between 21 and 27 years of age, graduates of a standard dental college, of good moral character and good professional education, and they shall be required to pass the usual physical examination required for appointment in the Medical Corps, and a professional examination which shall include tests of skill in practical dentistry and of proficiency in the usual subjects of a standard dental college course: Provided, That the contract dental surgeons attached to the Medical Department at the time of the passage of this act may be eligible for appointment as first lieutenants, dental corps, without limitation as to age: And provided further, That the professional examination for such appointment may be waived in the case of contract dental surgeons in the service at the time of the passage of this act whose efficiency reports and entrance examinations are satisfactory. The Secretary of War is authorized to appoint boards of three examiners to conduct the examinations herein prescribed, one of whom shall be a surgeon in the Army and two of whom shall be selected by the Secretary of War from the commissioned dental surgeons"; and the Senate agree to the same.

F. E. WARREN,
M. G. BULKELEY,
JAS. P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. A. T. HULL,
GEO. W. PRINCE,
WM. SULZER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Wyoming would state to the Senate whether the conference report establishes a dental corps in the Army.

Mr. WARREN. The proposition is, that instead of the three supervising dental officers and the various contract dental surgeons, there shall be not exceeding 60, or not exceeding one to a regiment who shall have the rank of first lieutenant. There are none above that rank. We have heretofore passed bills where such surgeons have been given the rank of captain, major, etc. This is cutting down that proposition to about the number we now use as contract surgeons, and making them first lieutenants.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this is the establishment by the authority of a conference committee of what has never been adopted by Congress in either branch, of a dental corps. I ask that the report may go over.

Mr. WARREN. I am perfectly willing that the report shall go over, but the Senator from Maine is in error. This establishes no corps. It is a part of the Medical Corps.

Mr. HALE. Let the Secretary read the provision of the conference report relative to the dental corps.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the provision to which the Senator from Maine refers.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 49, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"Strike out all of the matter appearing in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: 'Hereafter there shall be attached to the Medical Department a dental corps, which shall be composed of dental surgeons and acting dental surgeons'"——

Mr. HALE. That is enough, Mr. President. Let the report go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will go over.

PROPOSED RECESS.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina and Mr. HALE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I rise to the question of the order of business. In accordance with the notice I gave on Saturday, I now move that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. BAILEY. It is impossible for us to hear what the Senator from Maine it saying.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. HALE. My purpose in rising is to move that the Senate take a recess from half past 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock. It is evident, as I said the other day, that, unless we have evening sessions, with all the discomforts and burdens which they carry, it is simply not only impossible, but absurd, to think that we can dispose of the immense mass of unfinished matter which before Saturday noon ought to pass—all of the great appropriation bills, the subjects of public interest before the Senate, and, without going into any further enumeration, I think Senators will understand that, while it is a matter of inconvenience and burden, at this stage, with all these matters precipitated upon us, there is nothing else for us to do.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I agree thoroughly with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in thinking that it is impossible to conclude the work necessary without night sessions; but still I think it entirely possible and even easy to do so with night sessions of moderate length if we could get out of our way the unfinished business of the Senate. I have no objection to a recess if we can now get an agreement to vote upon the resolution touching the right of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] to his seat. I understand a request was preferred to vote to-morrow. That was denied because some Senators desired to address the Senate on that subject. Then a request was preferred for unanimous consent to vote on Wednesday; and that was objected to. I now venture to ask unanimous consent that the Senate will vote on that question at 2 o'clock on Thursday.

Mr. HALE. That is fair.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I recognize, I think, as fully as can the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] the importance to the Senate, to the country, and to the sitting Member of the resolution to which he referred; but it is not, in my opinion, the most important matter before this body. This resolution had its opportunity for the space of one month or more. I do not criticize the objection then made, which prevented a vote during that time.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator understands, of course, that the objection was based on the fact that the debate had not been concluded.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; but it was suggested that the vote be had at such a time that the debate could have been finished before the time came for the vote.

Mr. President, there is pending before the Senate a bill, which has been passed by the House of Representatives, which has been debated all over this country for years, and which is desired by a larger proportion of the people of this country than any other measure which is now before us; and, so far as I am concerned—and I speak only for myself—I intend to do everything within my power to induce those who are opposed to a consideration of the tariff-board bill to consent to its consideration and to a vote upon it—I mean, everything within my power and the limits of parliamentary procedure. I think that is very well understood.

I know that there are many Senators who desire yet to speak upon the Lorimer case; I do not know how the request of the Senator from Texas may affect the business of the Senate, and therefore I want it to be clearly understood—I make no concealment about it whatsoever—that unless a time can also be fixed for voting upon the bill which creates a tariff board, I shall object to fixing a time for voting upon the Lorimer resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. In other words, though the Senator from Iowa has said to the Senate and to the country that the Senator from Illinois is not entitled to his seat, he declines to allow the Senate to vote on that until the Senate will agree to vote on some other question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator is content to take that position, I am quite content to have him appear in that way before the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite content to stand by what I have said. I believe that the bill to which I have referred is of greater importance to the people of this country than any other measure now pending before this body. The Senator from Illinois is here; he is sitting as a Member of this body. The opportunity to vote upon his title to his seat will not be lost if this occasion passes; but the Senator from Texas, as well as every other Senator here, knows that if we do not avail ourselves of this opportunity to vote upon the bill creating a tariff board we will have no opportunity so to do for years to come.

Mr. BAILEY. Which means that the people, having given authority to the Democratic Party in the popular branch of Congress, it must be denied the right to settle that matter as it pleases, and it must be forced through the Senate in connection with a totally different matter before the expiration of this session.

The Senator from Iowa makes it plain that he is trying to defeat the latest expression of the people's will rather than to record it, because, if it be true that the people of this country want a tariff board, then, if the Democratic majority in the next House does not pass it, that majority itself will disappear. Much as the people will hesitate about calling the Republican Party back into power, they might do even such a foolish thing as that [laughter] if the Democratic Party does not behave itself wisely.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, whatever may be the fortunes or misfortunes of the future, I am very far from being pessimistic with regard to them. The House of Representatives has had its command to pass this bill from the people of the United States, and the House has passed the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; but three-fourths of the Democrats voted against it.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is here, and it is the duty of the Senate to deal with it if it can be dealt with within the time still remaining to us.

Mr. President, I have preferred this request, and it has been preferred more than once, I think; and, as I remember, the Senator from Texas has been the only Senator who refused or who made objection to fixing a time for a vote upon it. I am perfectly willing, Mr. President, to go forward with the unfinished business—do not understand me to ask any interference with the unfinished business—and when that has been debated and when that has been concluded there will be a vote, of course, upon it. But when we are asked to fix a time at which the vote can be had, I only reiterate my former statement, that unless we can agree with regard to the tariff-board bill, I shall not agree to a vote on the Lorimer resolution or any other measure save an appropriation bill, for I think it is my duty to do everything in my power to secure a vote upon this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, a moment if you please. I have gravely doubted whether the Democrats in either House of Congress ought to permit any legislation touching the tariff question at this session of Congress. The people of this country, at the last election, at least voted a want of confidence in the Republican Party, and I think expressed their confidence in the Democratic Party. It therefore seemed to me that we would have been well within our rights to have flatly said to our discredited opponents—I do not of course mean personally discredited, but politically discredited opponents—"you can do those things only which must necessarily be done, and leave these other things to the Representatives who come fresh from the people, with the people's commission in their hands, and the people's command upon them." But I did not deem it proper to urge that view, and I have not done it.

My own opinion now is that these appropriation bills ought to wait for the next Congress. I am told, or at least it is said in the papers that we are to have an extraordinary session; and while I am not in the habit of believing everything I see in the papers, I do believe almost everything I see in the papers as emanating from the White House, because it must be said to the credit of the gentlemen who represent the newspapers in the Executive offices that they seldom make a mistake in their report of what transpires there—and if it be true that we are to have an extraordinary session, I think these supply bills ought to be the work of the people's Representatives last elected rather than the work of those who have been rejected at the polls.

But I waive that. That is, I have waived it up to this time. Exactly how long I will continue to waive it is an open question in my mind.

But when a Senator stands here and tells the Senate and tells the country that this project for a permanent tariff board—one of the administration's measures, one of the devices by which Congress will be advised exactly how much protection shall be measured out to these various industries—must pass now or it can not pass at all, I remind him that that is an open confession that he is seeking to escape the latest judgment of the people; and if it can not pass in the next Congress, to my mind, sir, that is all the reason more why it ought not to pass in this Congress. I would resist it the more stubbornly because of the fact that they are trying to enact it into a law now under a knowledge that it is now or never with that proposition.

But, Mr. President, beyond all that, upon the question of the election of a Senator we act as judges, and I would as soon, if I had the honor to sit in connection with other judges, attempt to delay the judgment of a court as to attempt to delay the judgment of the Senate on a matter upon which it must act as judge.

I have witnessed some remarkable spectacles here in the debate and consideration of this case. I have seen honorable Senators, after the testimony was closed, after the witnesses were sworn, send out and obtain ex parte affidavits and bring them here and present them to the Senate. What would you think, sir, if a judge, after the testimony had closed in his court and after the attorneys had made their arguments, would step down from the bench and go about among the people asking for ex parte affidavits upon which he would base his judgment? Yet I have seen that remarkable spectacle in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Let me appeal to the Senator from Texas——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I have the floor on the motion for a recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAILEY. I had forgotten that, and I tender the Senator my apology.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Texas will not open all of the questions that will give rise to controversy and answer while my motion to take a recess until 8 o'clock is pending.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Maine withhold that until the Chair can submit——

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. Of course, nobody can speak while that motion is pending. The Chair understood the Senator from Maine to withhold it.

Mr. HALE. No; I did not.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought you withheld it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understood.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought the Senator withheld it that I might prefer a request for unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understood. But if the Senator from Maine makes his motion and insists upon a vote, the Chair must submit it.

Mr. BAILEY. I will ask the Senator from Maine to withhold it until I submit a request that the Senate vote on it next Thursday at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. Unless some Senator is prepared at once to object——

Mr. CUMMINS. I object.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I ask unanimous consent for a vote on this question at 2 o'clock Friday.

Mr. CUMMINS. I object.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I ask unanimous consent to vote on this question at 10 o'clock Saturday.

Mr. CUMMINS. I object.

Mr. BAILEY. Then it is evident we are not to have a vote on it unless we have upon a test of endurance; and I hope the Senate will not take a recess.

Mr. HALE. I want to say, about the matter of the recess, that it is simply a question of the convenience of the Senate. If we do not take a recess, we will run along until 7 or perhaps 8 o'clock and have nobody here, and we will do nothing.

Mr. BAILEY. And if we do take a recess we will not have a quorum when we reassemble.

Mr. HALE. If we do not have a quorum, we will not do any business.

Several SENATORS. Question!

Mr. HALE. I will submit the motion, at any rate, that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a division.

There were, on a division—ayes 22, noes 39.

So the Senate refused to take a recess.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I gave notice that I would proceed immediately after the close of the speech of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to discuss the question of reciprocity, but as some Senators wish to discuss the same subject discussed by the Senator from Georgia, and as the vote comes to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal, I will await another occasion. I give notice now that immediately after the speech of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] I will address the Senate on the subject of reciprocity.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 29360) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 30, 31, 32, 33, 200, 201, and 218.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 85, 86, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 202, and 205, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$90,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$7,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$71,820"; and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 99, 100, 101, and 102 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

F. E. WARREN,
E. J. BURKETT,
MURPHY J. FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

F. H. GILLETT,
JOSEPH V. GRAFF,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 134) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, in speaking on the joint resolution providing for the election of Senators by the people, with the so-called Sutherland amendment, I have no expectation of contributing anything to the able and exhaustive discussion of that subject which we have just heard from the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. And yet I desire to present briefly and somewhat informally the reasons why, although supporting the joint resolution as it was reported from the committee, I am unable to support it in its present shape.

I accept as an absolutely correct statement of the law the proposition laid down by the Senator from Georgia and acquiesced in on the floor the other day by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], namely, that under the Sutherland amendment Congress would have the same power in regard to the regulation and supervision and control of the election of United States Senators that it has to-day in regard to the election of Members of the House of Representatives, and that that power embraces, if Congress sees fit to exercise it, the appointment of Federal registrars to register the voters entitled to vote at such elections, the appointment of Federal judges and Federal supervisors to conduct such elections, the appointment of United States marshals and deputy marshals to carry out the directions of such supervisors and judges; the support, if need be, of the Army of the United States to aid in carrying out the orders and directions of such judges and supervisors; and, finally, the appointment of a canvassing board to ascertain who has been elected at such election and to certify the result to the United States Senate, such Senator to present as his credentials to the United States Senate the certificate of his election from the canvassing board instead of his commission from the governor of his State.

That power exists under no provision of the Constitution as that Constitution stands to-day. It does not exist under section 4 of Article I of that Constitution, giving to Congress the power to make and alter the regulations for the election of Members of the Senate, because that power, as the Constitution stands to-day, only comes into play after the organization of the legislature which elects a Senator. It does not go to the polling place. It has no control over the election of members of the legislature.

It has been suggested, however, that possibly this power exists under the second section of amendment 15 to the Constitution, which provides that Congress may by appropriate legislation enforce the fifteenth amendment, which provides that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

I deny that under that provision any such power as is here contemplated does exist. No warrant for it is found in any decision of the United States court construing the fifteenth amendment. No suggestion of the existence of such a power can be found in any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States passing on the fifteenth amendment.

More than that, in all of the long, bitter, exhaustive, and able debates of this body at the time when it was proposed to enact the "force law" in 1890, and again in 1894, when the Federal supervision laws were repealed, in debates where the constitutionality of those laws was seriously questioned and discussed, the suggestion was never made, no Senator ever contended here, that the power to regulate Federal elections arose by virtue of any other provision than the power to make and alter the regulations of the State. No one suggested that under the fifteenth amendment the power existed in Congress to take charge and control of the machinery of the election of Members of the House of Representatives.

There can be no question, Mr. President, that the power under the fifteenth amendment is a power directed against the States—against State action—that so far as it ever affects individuals it is a corrective power, simply a power to enact corrective legislation. There is no power to enact general legislation to take charge and control of the machinery of the election. If that were true, there would be a similar power under the fourteenth amendment, which provides that no State can deprive one of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Congress can enact corrective legislation under the fourteenth amendment, but it has never been contended that Congress, where there was a denial by the State of due process of law, could enact general legislation which would enable it to take charge of and administer the laws so that there should be no deprivation of life, liberty, and property without due process of law.

I take it that the correct rule as to the fourteenth amendment and the power of Congress under it, which applies equally to the fifteenth amendment, is found in this statement of the Supreme Court of the United States in James against Bowman, One hundred and ninetieth United States, quoting with approval the civil-rights case:

> And so in the present case, until some State law has been passed, or some State action through its officers or agents has been taken, adverse to the rights of citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment, nor any proceeding under such legislation, can be called into activity; for the prohibitions of the amendment are against State laws and acts done under State authority. Of course, legislation may, and should be, provided in advance to meet the exigency when it arises; but it should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the amendment was intended to provide against; and that is, State laws or State action of some kind, adverse to the rights of the citizen secured by the amendment. Such legislation can not properly cover the whole domain of rights appertaining to life, liberty, and property, defining them and providing for their vindication. That would be to establish a code of municipal law regulative of all private rights between man and man in society. It would be to make Congress take the place of the State legislatures and to supersede them. It is absurd to affirm that, because the rights of life, liberty, and property (which include all civil rights that men have) are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the State without due process of law, Congress may therefore provide due process of law for their vindication in every case; and that, because the denial by a State to any persons of the equal protection of the laws is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection. In fine, the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation upon the rights of the citizen, but corrective legislation; that is, such as may be necessary and proper for counteracting such laws as the States may adopt or enforce, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from making or enforcing, or such acts and proceedings as the States may commit or take, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from committing or taking.

It is the same limitation that obtains in regard to the powers of Congress under the fifteenth amendment. If that were not true, if Congress has, under the power to pass appropriate legislation to enforce the fifteenth amendment, the power to take charge of the machinery of elections, it would be a much broader power than that conferred by the Sutherland amendment, because the power would not be to protect the person elected because he was a member of the Federal Government, not to protect him because he was a Senator, not to guard the election because it was the election of a Member of the House, but it would be to protect the party offering to cast his vote from a denial of that right, and therefore that power would extend not only to the election of Federal officers, not only to the election of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, but it would invade the sovereignty of the State and could control every election, whether it be municipal, district, county, or State; it could strip the State of every vestige of sovereignty and control the elections for governor as easily as it could the elections for United States Senator.

Such a proposition is monstrous and preposterous. It finds no warrant in any decision of the courts of this country. So we are faced with the naked proposition that if this power is to be given by the Sutherland amendment, it is a power which never existed before under the Constitution of the United States since the creation of the Government. This is a truth which can neither be disguised nor successfully controverted.

Is it a power that we are willing to extend to the Federal Government? While the people of my State desire that there shall be an election of Senators by the people, they have that mode of election in their own State to-day under the primary elections system, and they are unwilling, in order to give that privilege to States that do not care for it, to extend the power of the Federal Government in the control of elections beyond what that power has ever been under the Constitution as it has existed up to this day.

I do not regard this as a sectional question. It interests every section of this Union. Yet, unquestionably, it is true that because of the peculiar conditions in the South, it concerns us more vitally than it does any other section of the Union. I do not consider that the race question is one that concerns the South alone or that we alone are entitled to deal with it. It concerns the welfare and the happiness and the protection under the flag of this country of 9,000,000 citizens of the country; but in other sections of the country it is regarded as a matter which affects the negro alone, while to the South it not only affects the millions of negroes there, but the millions of white people likewise who are residing there; and therefore it is a matter of more vital concern to them than it is to any other section of the country.

If I interpreted aright the expressions which fell from the lips of Senators during this debate in regard to the exercise of the power of the Federal Government over elections, they meant that as long as the South handles this question in a manner satisfactory to the Congress of the United States there shall be no interference with the southern people in the handling of it; but whenever, in the opinion of Congress, that question is not being handled there fairly and justly toward the negro, Congress reserves to itself the power to interfere.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PERCY. I do.

Mr. CARTER. I assume that the continuance of that power is the particular part of this proposal which the Senator objects to. In the course of some observations recently made I contended, and I believe the position of the Senator from Mississippi as stated agrees with the contention, that legislation, with reference to elections and the franchise, if based upon authority given in the fifteenth amendment, would be merely corrective, applicable only to the States; whereas under the first part of section 4, Article I, to which the Sutherland amendment was directed, the right is given the Federal Government by appropriate congressional action in execution of the law to go into the respective States where, in the judgment of Congress, the Federal power should interfere to appoint, if need be, registry agents, judges, and clerks of election for the purpose of insuring, through the prescribing of the election machinery and the conduct of the election itself, such regard for the rights of persons under the fifteenth amendment as the Congress might think proper to prescribe and enforce.

Now, I understand the Senator to mean that if the joint resolution is passed as it now stands, with the Sutherland amendment adopted, the Federal Government will have that power as to a senatorial election precisely as it has the power with reference to a congressional election, save and except as to the fixing of the place of the election. Is that the part to which the Senator objects?

Mr. PERCY. Unquestionably. I adopt the Senator's construction, and I object to the extension of the very power the Senator from Montana has enumerated to the control of the election for Senators. There is no controversy about our respective positions, as stated by the Senator from Montana. There is no controversy between us as to the legal effect of the Sutherland amendment. I believe I state the position of the Senators who have spoken on the question correctly when I state that their attitude is that, while sympathizing with the South in the handling of this race problem, Congress was willing, as long as the South handled it in such a way as commended itself to the approval of Congress, to leave the handling of it to the South, but that when the South failed to handle it in such a manner as Congress thought it should be handled Congress reserved the right to control the Federal elections as to Members of the House, a power which it now has, and Congress, under the Sutherland amendment, desired to extend that control to the election of United States Senators.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, undoubtedly the power of Congress to control elections authorized in the first part of the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution would follow to the polls precisely as it is exercised now with reference to legislatures. I am free to say to the Senator that I would not have voted for the joint resolution if the Sutherland amendment had not been adopted for the very reason that, according to my views, the right of the Government to control and regulate the election of Senators and Representatives in Congress should not be surrendered, and that position is taken with reference to the North as well as the South.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, my reply to the contention that Congress should have the power to intervene in Federal elections whenever Congress sees fit to do so, and that that power, if Senators are to be elected by the people, should be extended to the election of Senators, is this: That there will never come the day, however bad conditions there may seem, when Congress can intervene and use that power in the South, except disastrously to the welfare and the prosperity of the South and to the detriment and injury of both the black and the white man there; and believing that way, I would say that whenever Congress, either by reason of the exigency of some political demand or because it is the misguided victim of a maudlin philanthropy, seeks to intervene by control of Federal elections in the South, I want to restrain the field of its pernicious activity to as small an area as possible, to the area to which it is restricted to-day and has ever been restricted by the Constitution of the United States; and never by my vote will I extend the power of Congress to control Federal elections beyond the power as it exists to-day under the Constitution as it stands. And that, Mr. President, although the laws regulating suffrage in the South are valid and constitutional, so declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, and although those laws are administered in fairness, in justice, and in honesty by the officers charged with the administration of them.

Mr. President, it is difficult almost to realize the difference in conditions in the South on this question and elsewhere. There are to-day in the United States, according to the census of 1900—I have not the one of 1910—in round numbers 9,000,000 Negroes. Of that number 90 per cent reside in the Southern States. In the States of Alabama, Mississippi, and Georgia 31 per cent of the total negro population resides. Only seven-tenths of 1 per cent reside in the New England States. I will just read a paragraph from probably the ablest authority who has written on the race question, "Studies of the American race problem," by Alfred Holt Stone, to give some idea of the preponderance of that population:

> There are more negroes in Mississippi than in Cape Colony or Natal, even with the great territory of Zululand annexed to the latter; more than in the Transvaal, and not far from as many as in both the Boer colonies combined; more than in Jamaica and Barbados combined; more than in Trinidad and all the remaining English islands combined, excluding those just named; more than in Cuba and Porto Rico combined; more than in either Haiti or Santo Domingo.

In the county of Washington, in which I live, there are 5,000 white people and 44,000 negroes. There are more negroes in that county than there are in 18 States combined that can be named in the United States, more than there are in any one of 28 States which can be named. The Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] in his address the other day made a misstatement as to the negro population of New York State, which I first thought was simply a typographical error. He stated there were 300,000 negro voters in New York City. The last census shows that there were less than a hundred thousand negroes in New York State all told.

So, Mr. President, with this enormous negro population, the framers of the constitution of 1890 in Mississippi met to frame a constitution under which a white man's government could be maintained, to establish a white man's government under and not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Never did a more difficult task confront the people of our race, and rarely ever was such a task dealt with by men of more distinguished ability and sincere patriotism.

The present constitution was the result of that convention. There was no concealment about the object sought to be attained. It was to obstruct the exercise of negro suffrage to the point where it would not be a menace to the government. That object was avowed. Say, by the supreme court of Mississippi in the following significant language quoted by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Williams case: The supreme court of the State of Mississippi, in Ratcliffe v. Beale (26 Sou., 865), said:

> Within the field of permissible action under the limitations imposed by the Federal Constitution the convention swept the field of expedience to obstruct the exercise of suffrage by the negro race.

Again—

> Restrained by the Federal Constitution from discriminating against the negro race, the convention discriminates against its characteristics and the offenses to which its members are prone.

Says the Supreme Court of the United States:

> But nothing tangible can be deduced from this. If weakness were to be taken advantage of, it was to be done within the field of permissible action under the limitations imposed by the Federal Constitution, and the means of it were the alleged characteristics of the negro race, not the administration of the law by officers of the State. Besides, the operation of the constitution and laws is not limited by their language or effects to one race. They reach weak and vicious white men as well as weak and vicious black men, and whatever is sinister in their intention, if anything, can be prevented by both races by the exertion of that duty which voluntarily pays taxes and refrains from crime.

That was the idea of the convention. It was understood by the Supreme Court, and it was understood by the humblest citizen in the land. The Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], in his speech the other day related an anecdote more amusing than instructive, of a negro preacher, the graduate of a college, who sought to register in Mississippi, but having read the constitution failed to interpret it to the satisfaction of the registrar. Such an incident could never have occurred, because when the constitution is read, no interpretation of it is required; but this incident would illustrate just as well as the one given by the Senator from New York the point which he had in view. An ignorant negro presented himself to register and said to the registrar: "I can neither read nor write, but I want to be tried on the understanding clause." The officer, turning over the constitution to find some clause to question him on, said: "Bill, what are constitutions made for anyway?" The answer, cheerful and immediate, was: "Why, boss, they's made to keep negroes from voting." [Laughter.] That was the understanding of the object of this convention and the object of this constitution both by the learned and by the unlettered and humble.

By what provisions, however, was that object sought to be accomplished? By expedients which seemed simple almost to the point of childishness; but they were directed by those who understood the negro character to the racial characteristics of that race. There is no grandfather clause in the Mississippi constitution; there is nothing difficult of construction in the language of that constitution. The provisions which are relied upon, and which have proven most effective, are, first, that the party seeking to vote shall register, and the registration closes four months prior to the election; that in order to register he must be able to either read the constitution or to interpret it when read to him; and third, that he must pay the taxes in the year in which he offers to vote on or before the 1st day of February in that year for the preceding two years. Those are almost the sole requisites necessitated by the Mississippi constitution, and yet under those provisions, administered fairly and honestly, there has been an almost absolute elimination of the negro vote.

You have heard much of the interpretation clause. There have not been, since the constitution of 1890, 100 men in the State of Mississippi disqualified from registering because of failure to understand the constitution. These simple provisions have proven absolutely effective.

The voter is required to register, and the opportunity is given him. He is required to pay his taxes, and the opportunity is given him to pay them. He is required to either read or to understand the constitution, and public schools dot the entire land, open to both races separately.

To the aid of these constitutional provisions has come the primary election system. Nominations are made by primary elections, and the same qualifications are applied to primary elections as are applied to general elections. In the Democratic primary only white men are allowed to participate. The result is that the white vote is cast for the nominee of the Democratic primary and that owing to the small number of negroes who have qualified themselves as electors they hold no primary, make no nomination, and cast no vote. The provisions of the constitution disfranchise 80 per cent of the negro race and the other 20 per cent do not hold a primary election because they are in a hopeless minority. They have not that earnest wish, that stern resolve, to exercise the right of suffrage which characterizes our race. They have to be stimulated by the immediate hope of victory or they have to be aroused by the appeal of the white man before they take any interest in exercising the right of suffrage. The negro has never sought to exercise the right of suffrage except where the white man has appealed to his passion or to his cupidity.

The same law which disqualifies 80 per cent of the negroes disqualifies nearly 20 per cent of the white men of Mississippi. I have in my pocket now a decision rendered within the past week by the attorney general of Mississippi construing the suffrage provisions of the constitution and the laws passed thereunder and construing them in regard to the primary election to be held by the white people of Mississippi. Those provisions disqualify nearly 20 per cent, about 20,000 white men, in Mississippi from participating in the election. That is one of the costs that we pay in order to disfranchise a large proportion of the negroes.

There is another and a greater cost paid by the white men of Mississippi for the right of a white man's government there, and that is that all political discussion of the issues of the day which would tend to split the white men of the State is eliminated. However great may be the differences of opinion, however intense may be the partisan feeling, all that is subordinated to a solid white vote; however great may be the ambition that prompts men to struggle for influence, place, and position, that must be smothered in order that the white vote shall remain intact. Is that no price for men of our race to pay in order to control their government? It shows that the danger is great and overshadowing that would drive the Anglo-Saxon people, with their aggressive individuality, with their proneness to struggle for power and leadership, into solid ranks where all differences are buried.

No higher proof could be given of the intelligence, the patriotism, the capacity for government of the white men of Mississippi than their course in handling this problem. The intelligence with which they grasped the full significance of the danger confronting them, the dauntless courage and the wisdom with which they grappled with the difficulties of the situation, the constitution which they framed—the model followed by nearly every other Southern State—the self-sacrificing patriotism they have evinced in making the provisions of that constitution effective, all bear witness to the possession of those high qualities of statesmanship and leadership which have made the Anglo-Saxon people the conquering race of the world.

Under this constitution, administered by the State officers without discrimination, administered in honesty and in justice, there has been unparalleled prosperity for both races; there has been an era of good feeling and an absence of friction; the white man controls the government and the black man acquiesces in that control. That condition is liable to be disturbed in one of two ways—by the demagogue at home or by interference from abroad.

The demagogue at home addresses himself to whatever will forward his own political ambition. He preaches the repeal of the fifteenth amendment as being the dominant issue of the South, overshadowing everything else, and, in seeking to arouse interest in that behalf, he appeals to race passion and race hatred, and creates bitterness and discord between the races; and with equal ability, earnestness, and plausibility he would advocate the extermination of the inferior race if he thought such advocacy a surer road to political preferment. With him the conservative, intelligent people in the various Southern States can be left to deal, knowing that in the final outcome they will control their government and control it with firmness, yet in justice and in kindness to the inferior race. But that condition at last depends upon the solidarity of the white race and upon the patriotism of the white man. If into that delicately adjusted condition we project an intervention by a hostile power—because whenever the intervention comes it comes as a hostile intervention; it comes because Congress believes that the white men in the South are unable to control and direct their own government, and because Congress believes that the rights of the black man have been disregarded by the dominant power in the South—so it comes as a hostile power, and, coming in that way, it operates to arouse anger and antagonism among the white people, and it operates as an appeal and an invitation to the black people of the South. It is saying to them "your rights have been disregarded heretofore and trampled upon, but now we are going to control these elections. Go register and vote with the guaranty that your votes will be counted." It furnishes an incentive—yes, a command—for them to exercise that power in regard to which they are absolutely indifferent, and it furnishes the golden opportunity for race agitators of both races to come in and appeal to the lawless element of each race. Such intervention by the Federal Government would say to the white people, "from your hands has been wrested the control of your own elections. Your own Government holds you to be incapable of self-government, unfit to administer your own laws, and proposes, by its officers, to take charge of your elections and by military force, if need be, give to the negro the right to vote, even if such right results in placing him in control of your government." Thus you would arouse race passion and race feeling to the point where the conservative, the intelligent, Christian, and God-fearing white people of the South would no longer be able to control and administer their own laws.

After that era of intervention should have passed away, an era bound to be marked by the paralysis of prosperity and a chaotic condition of government, there would remain, it is true, the white man's government intact because of the indomitable courage and because of the virus of dominion in the blood of the white man; but there would also remain two races estranged and embittered toward each other, and the control of the affairs of the South would have been by this ill-timed, ill-advised, unwise, and vicious intervention wrested from the hands of the conservative people of the South.

While Congress in the exercise of such power could, if it saw fit, give an opportunity for the exercise of the right of suffrage by the negro, it has no power to protect him in his life, liberty, property, and pursuit of happiness. If that intervention came as the result of an appeal from the black race, when the intervention ceased the black men would find that they had in fact bartered their birthright for a mess of pottage; that they had, in order to secure the right of suffrage, robbed the intelligent white men of the South of the ability to protect them in their property, in their lives, and in the pursuit of happiness by them.

So, Mr. President, I am unwilling to vote for the joint resolution with the vital, substantive extension of power to the Federal Government carried in it. I am unwilling further, if the proposition to intervene by the Federal Government should ever arise, to make the chances of intervention greater by making the stake played for greater, by giving the right to intervene, not only as to Members of Congress, but as to Members of the United States Senate. It would be an additional argument, an additional incentive, if that intervention were prompted by political motive for the intervention itself. In my opinion, to extend this power would be unwise from the standpoint of any section of the country; to extend the power so as to regulate senatorial elections from the standpoint of the South would be one of those blunders so egregious as to constitute a crime.

It is suggested, why not vote for the resolution and leave it to the legislatures of the States as to whether they will ratify it?

Mr. President, if the ratification was to be submitted to the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, I would unhesitatingly pursue this course, but however strongly opposed to the ratification of the resolution in its present form the Legislature of Mississippi might be, the legislatures of 12 other States would have to stand with her in order to defeat the resolution. Deeply sensible as I am of the great danger to the South in the adoption of the resolution, I will cheerfully submit the question to the wisdom of my own legislature, but I am unwilling to submit to the legislatures of 47 other States, in no one of which the danger to be guarded against is as great as it is in Mississippi, the determination of a question so fraught with danger to the people of Mississippi.

Mr. JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. JONES. I understand the Senator from Arkansas desires two or three minutes. I am perfectly willing to yield to him.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the pending joint resolution. I had the honor to do that on the 30th of January, but I rise for the purpose of explaining my attitude on the matter since the adoption of the Sutherland amendment, and I will avail myself of the few moments given so kindly by the Senator from Washington having yielded the floor to me.

I have stated, Mr. President, to some of my colleagues, and also in the Democratic caucus, that if the so-called Sutherland amendment were adopted as a part of the joint resolution, I would not support the joint resolution. I feared at that time, and I fear now, that the adoption of that amendment has cut the very life out of the original proposition.

But, sir, I am willing to trust the legislature of my State and the legislatures of the various States that are to be called upon to adopt this resolution should it finally pass. I believe in their wisdom, and I shall trust their judgment. Knowing that my people are very anxious that the people of the country should have the right to elect their Senators by the direct vote, I shall yield my fears along this line to their better judgment and leave it to them for their final decision, and shall vote for the joint resolution even with the Sutherland amendment attached.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the legal phases of this proposition that have been raised and that have largely occupied the time of the Senate in the debate on this joint resolution. I simply want to present a few of the reasons why I am in favor of the adoption of this resolution as amended. For a great many years I have been in favor of the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people, and in the Fifty-sixth Congress, while a Member of the House of Representatives, I voted for a resolution similar to this one, and also in subsequent Congresses I voted for a resolution of the same character. The resolution which has been presented here and which was submitted to the Senate by the Judiciary Committee provided that in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3, Article I, of the Constitution, as it now stands, and which reads as follows:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

And in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 as relates to filling vacancies which reads as follows:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature which shall then fill such vacancies.

And in lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4, which reads as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The following be submitted:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.
>
> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.
> When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election, as the legislature may direct.
> This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

That is the resolution as it was reported from the committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JONES. I did not really yield for that purpose, but I do not understand that I have any right to say with reference to that. Personally, I would prefer to go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names.

Bacon	Clark, Wyo.	Heyburn	Root
Bailey	Clarke, Ark.	Johnston	Shively
Bankhead	Crane	Jones	Simmons
Bourne	Crawford	Kean	Smith, Md.
Bradley	Cummins	Lorimer	Smoot
Brandegee	Curtis	McCumber	Stephenson
Briggs	Davis	Martin	Stone
Bristow	Depew	Nixon	Swanson
Brown	Dick	Oliver	Thornton
Bulkeley	Dillingham	Owen	Warner
Burnham	Dixon	Page	Watson
Burrows	Flint	Paynter	Wetmore
Burton	Foster	Penrose	Young
Carter	Gallinger	Percy
Chamberlain	Gamble	Perkins
Clapp	Guggenheim	Piles

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. JONES. Under the Constitution as it is now Senators are elected by the legislature. This the people desire to change, and this resolution proposes an amendment under which they shall be elected by the people. This is one simple and distinct proposition.

The Constitution also provides now that the times, places, and manner of electing Senators are to be prescribed by the State legislatures, but the right and power is reserved to Congress to make and alter such regulations.

Under the proposed amendment, as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, this power of Congress was taken away and the same was given entirely and exclusively to the State legislatures by the following provision:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

This is another distinct proposition. This provision the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] moved to strike out. This motion has been agreed to by the Senate, this provision has been eliminated and the resolution now reads as follows:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.
> When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election, as the legislature may direct.
> This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

That is the resolution as it will be voted upon by the Senate. It contains but one simple, distinct proposition, and that is the proposition to elect Senators by direct vote of the people.

I consider it very unfortunate that it was deemed necessary to report the two distinct propositions to the Senate, because it has led to a controversy here that should not have arisen.

The people of the country have long been asking for the one simple proposition to elect Senators by a direct vote. It is not fair to the people to grant their petition coupled with another proposition that they have not considered, one over which a great deal of controversy may arise, and has arisen already in this body; and if it arises here, it would certainly arise in the legislatures of the various States. It is not fair to say to the people that in order to secure what they desire, what they have asked for, what they have petitioned for, they must take something that they have not asked for, that they have not sought, and to which possibly they may very seriously object. So we have stricken out the second proposition, and it will be wise, reasonable, and patriotic for all of us who honestly believe in the election of Senators by direct vote of the people to accept this resolution, vote for it, and submit this specific proposition to the people of the country, or, rather, to the legislatures of the various States, for their adoption or rejection.

Those who object to the election of Senators by the people will then be compelled to oppose it upon its merits, and instead of our placing a club in their hands by which they can defeat it in the various legislatures they will have to stand before those legislatures and discuss it upon its merits. The issue will be plain and clear cut.

This debate has proceeded much as if we were to determine the merits of the proposition here. We are not. The only question for us to decide is whether or not we shall give the people, through their legislatures, the opportunity to say whether this change in the Constitution should be made.

It is well, of course, for us to discuss here the merits of the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, and yet, that, to my mind, so far as this body is concerned, is not the real question. The question is whether we will submit this proposed amendment to the legislatures, and let it be discussed upon its merits. And it seems to me that it would be the proper course for those who are opposed to the election of Senators by the people, who think that it would be unwise to adopt the amendment, to go to the State legislatures and say to them: "We have been willing to submit this proposition to you. We do not believe in it. We do not believe you should adopt it." And then point out to the legislatures the reasons why it should not be adopted.

I have confidence in the intelligence of our legislatures. I have confidence in their patriotism and their desire to amend the Constitution of the United States only in such ways as will be for the best interests of the people of this country, and I believe that they can be safely trusted to pass upon this proposition. They can be safely trusted to weigh the objections, if there are any, that may be made and to reach a wise conclusion thereon.

Mr. President, in my judgment, it is our duty to submit this amendment. We are untrue to the people and the States we represent if we do not. Who are we that we should deny their repeated requests? Are we their masters or their servants? Are we their rulers or their representatives? Again and again they have asked the privilege of passing on this question. Year after year they have besought us to submit this amendment. They have done it by letters, petitions, and conventions. The Democratic Party has declared for it in its national platform, and the candidate for President on the Republican ticket declared for it in the last campaign. The House of Representatives, chosen directly by the people and representing their will, has time and again sent its petition to this body in the shape of resolutions passed by overwhelming votes. Away back in 1892 they passed one. Then in the Fifty-third Congress, by a vote of 141 to 50, they passed this resolution; then in the Fifty-fifth Congress, by a vote of 185 to 11, they passed this resolution and sent it to this body, respectfully requesting us to submit it to the legislatures of the States; and in the Fifty-sixth Congress, by a vote of 242 to 15.

Some claim that we are not accountable to the people; that we are the agents of the legislature as representing the States. Very well. Legislature after legislature has petitioned us to submit this amendment. We have refused. We have defied not only the petitions of the people, but we have defied the commands of our sovereign States. We have denied our very creators. Is it any wonder that the people are beginning to wonder, "Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed that he is grown so great?" It is said that 37 State legislatures, the creators of 74 members of this body, have asked by solemn memorial, in one form or another, its representatives to submit this amendment. It has never yet even reached a vote in this body. This is arrogance gone mad. We profess great regard for the State legislatures, and yet the only attention or respect we pay to their memorials is to ask that they be printed in the RECORD. We have no right to refuse the demand of the people; we have no right to refuse the demands of the legislatures in this matter, a matter which touches their capacity and intelligence. I have some pride of opinion. I am willing to assume responsibility for action here. I am willing to assume that I am better able to decide upon legislation proposed here than the people whom I represent, because of information not available to them and because of my better knowledge of the situation here, but I do not believe I have the right, whatever may be my personal views, to deny a request of my people, expressed by conventions and through legally constituted legislatures. When I do that I assume the position of master and despot instead of servant and representative.

Mr. President, this Senate, in refusing to submit this question, is defying the people and the States, and the longer we deny their petitions the stronger will grow their determination to have this change made in the Constitution. We best feed the flames of their desire by repeated denials, and give color to the claim that we are the bulwark of the "interests" and the enemy of the people's rights and weal. We may refuse their petition again, but the time is coming and right soon when their will can no longer be resisted. Senator Hoar was right when he said, in that powerful argument he made against this proposition, which has been the basis for all the argument made against it in this debate:

> But whenever the American people has made up its mind, when its judgment is formed, when its will is determined, that will is sure to be carried into effect. Whether through Senates or over Senates, through courts or over courts, through Presidents or over Presidents, through Constitutions or over Constitutions, the irresistible current will make its way.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] says there "is not a very active or violent feeling for this change." This same view was expressed more than 14 years ago by Senator Chandler in this body. He said, in replying to an able argument by the honored senior Senator from California in favor of direct election of Senators:

> I do not, myself, believe with the Senator from California, that the desire for the proposed change is strengthening in the minds of the people of the country. On the contrary, I believe it is a craze, a Populistic notion, which has not really taken hold of the members of either of the two great political parties, but is only a hobby or a fad of the Populistic Party, which, if it is not adopted within a few years, will never be heard of again.

He was mistaken. The Populistic Party has passed away, but this "fad" or "craze" is stronger than ever, and, judging from the rather radical utterances that I see in the press from this honorable gentleman now, I am rather inclined to think that he has been inoculated with this craze or this "Populistic fad" that he thought was likely to pass away very soon.

The declarations of conventions, the announcements of candidates for high offices, and the solemn memorials passed by State legislatures all refute the contention of the Senator from New York that there is not an "active" demand for this change. And let me suggest to those who are opposed to this demand, the sooner you grant it the easier it will be for you to defeat it with the people. If this question had been submitted years ago it would probably have been defeated. We want that which is denied us either as individuals or as a people, and if you would preserve the Constitution as it is, submit this to the people and go before them and tell them they are not capable of choosing their agents directly; tell them that they lack the intelligence and stability to be trusted with the choosing of the members of this body; and show them that by adopting the amendment our constitutional government will be destroyed and the equality of the States threatened. Our people are intelligent, they revere the traditions of the Fathers, they prize our Constitution and are jealous of its perfection. They will weigh your arguments, they will consider the dangers pointed out and the effects to be feared, and if you are right they will sustain you by electing legislatures that will reject the amendment. But if you refuse you exhibit your distrust of the people and want of confidence in the legislatures.

They say this proposition creates a distrust of representative government. The persistent denial of the petitions of the people has already created in their minds a distrust in their representatives, and to continue this denial will intensify this distrust.

They say we would rob the legislatures of power, dignity, and consequence, and yet we mock their power, insult their dignity, and minimize their consequence by habitually spurning their memorials, and discredit and insult them by denying their petitions.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York is concerned about the stability and conservatism of the Senate. So am I. It has been a stable and conservative body and yet safely responsible to the people's needs. Its stability and conservatism does not depend upon the manner of electing its members. These come from its small numbers, its secure tenure, its great responsibilities, and varied duties. Election by the people would not shorten its tenure, would not make more single its power, would not deprive it of any of its legislative, executive, or judicial functions, would not deprive it of any of its control over the raising and expenditure of revenue by lessening its power of amendment, would not deprive it of its appointive power resulting from the necessity of its confirmation, would not lessen its control over foreign affairs because it does not take away its consent to the ratification of treaties, would not lessen its power in impeachment trials; and the same inducements that have caused the Senate of the United States to perform "its duty loyally, faithfully, and competently, and has furnished to the history of its country a line of illustrious names and a record of great achievement which furnish one of the most convincing proofs the world has yet had that popular government through representative institutions is a possibility among men" will continue to impel the representatives of the people's will to show themselves worthy of the traditions of the past and of the people who may honor them by selecting them to continue to discharge the high duties of this great office with an eye single to the people's good and the glory of their great country.

It is said that this will interfere with one of the great compromises of the Constitution, and we are warned not to put the great industrial communities in an attitude where they can say that the honorable compromise of the Constitution has been taken away and that they should be allowed a greater representation in this body than the smaller States. I do not believe this fear is well founded. I can find nothing in the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention indicating that the manner of choosing the Senators was anything more than a mere difference of opinion and did not go to the fundamentals. No State threatened to remain out of the Union because this or that method was used in selecting Senators. Representation in this body by two Senators from each State, large and small, was a fundamental compromise without which it is probable, yea certain, that the Union would not have been perfected. This it is not proposed to interfere with in any way. This provision was adopted in the convention as a separate and distinct proposition and independent of the provision as to manner of election. It was no more a part of the compromise than the length of term. The Constitution itself clearly indicates what the compromise was when it expressly provides "that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." This means equal representation in the Senate, and if the manner of selecting that suffrage had been in mind the framers of that immortal document would have left nothing in such an important matter to intendment.

We are told that to make this change would reflect upon the makers of the Constitution. They were not perfect. They did not consider their work perfect. This provision was not their unanimous wisdom. The master minds of that convention—Madison, Hamilton, and Wilson—were even then in favor of the election of Senators by the people and of building our Government upon the broad base of the people rather than on the props of the legislatures. It was adopted by force of numbers rather than by the judgment of master intellects. At any rate, they did not disregard public opinion in determining the method to be adopted. It was, as Hamilton or Madison said, "probably the most congenial with public opinion."

In other words, the men who framed the Constitution were governed and influenced by the state of public opinion at that time in determining how the Senators should be elected.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask a question for information. The statement of the Senator is very interesting. I understood the Senator from Washington to say that Madison was in favor of the election of Senators by popular vote.

Mr. JONES. I so infer from the proceedings of the convention. He probably did not declare distinctly for it, but in the argument submitted by him then and subsequently he indicated very clearly that he preferred that method of election.

The reasons for its adoption then would hardly appeal to us now or be "congenial with public opinion." I do not find many of the arguments for this method advanced now that were advanced then. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] does not say that "the people should have as little to do as may be about the Government." The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] does not insist that "the Senate should bear as strong a likeness to the British House of Lords as possible." The Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] does not dare to advocate this method, "because it would be most likely to provide some check in favor of commercial interests against the landed." No one says that our evils "flow from the excess of democracy." No one advocates this method, because "the commercial and moneyed interests would be more secure," or because "the people are for paper money and the legislatures are against it," and yet these seemed to be the controlling reasons in selecting this method. We do not discredit the fathers when we say these reasons do not apply now; the conditions existing then are not the same as now. We do them honor by showing our advancement in wealth, commerce, education, art, science, and not the least in our improvement in government. The method adopted served its purpose, but conditions now warrant the conclusion that the master minds of that convention were right.

Mr. President, why do the people desire this change? Not because corrupt men have often been elected to this body, not because men lacking in ability have been placed here. The most illustrious in our Nation's annals have dignified and exalted this body. It has not failed to meet the expectations of the founders of the Republic in discharging the functions of government. As Senator HOAR said:

> It has responded quite as speedily and quite as directly to the sober conclusion of the popular judgment and to the settled desires of the popular heart as has the other House or has any State legislature.

I can also agree with him when he says:

> It has originated far more than its proportion of the great measures in our legislative history for the benefit of the people which are found in our statute books.

What he said then is true to-day, and since that was stated the Senate has fully sustained its reputation for adopting, originating, and promoting legislation in the interest of the people. Some of the most important laws that are upon the statute books to-day were placed there since Senator HOAR uttered these words. They were enacted at the instance of the Senate itself. No; it is not because corrupt men have been sent to the Senate; it is not because weak and selfish men have been sent to this body that the people desire this change.

This desire originated from causes outside of the Senate. During the last 40 years we have experienced a growth in material development that is amazing and surpasses the possibility of tongue or pen to depict. Population has increased by millions. Settlers have pushed from sea to sea, have cleared lands, have bridged rivers, have scaled mountains, have established cities, and builded States. Manufacturing has expanded by leaps and bounds and the air has become vibrant with whirling wheels and black with the smoke of thousands of furnaces. Great transportation lines have been established, iron tracks have been laid and places, communities, and industries have been brought in close proximity which before had been almost isolated. Telegraph and telephone lines have annihilated distance and great inventions have revolutionized industries and the whole commercial world. Great corporations were formed in every line of business activity. Great and undreamed-of fortunes were amassed by individuals as well as corporations and all these developments have led to new and undreamed-of activities in political lines. These great industrial powers began to be affected by legislation and began to take an interest in the doings of State legislatures because their interests were affected by legislation. Their influence in politics and legislation was insidious but rapid. Through the manipulations of party machinery they exerted a greater or less influence on legislation. Then the political boss developed and members of the legislatures went to the legislatures not to represent the people, but to do the will of the boss. It was only a step to attempt to control and dominate the election of United States Senators either in the interest of some great industry or in the interest of some political faction or both. Members of the legislature have acted according to their own sweet will and for their own individual interests, politically and otherwise. Parties have been divided over individual senatorial aspirants. The interests of the people and the State have been disregarded and individual gain and interests preferred. Public offices have been openly bartered for political support. The whole time of legislatures has been spent in futile efforts to elect a Senator, the people have been humiliated, the States have gone on unrepresented and legislation for the people has been neglected or dominated by the senatorial contest. The people have seen plainly the perversion of the system of electing Senators. It did not elect, but it did corrupt legislators and foster a traffic in public offices and pervert legislation. The maneuvers and intrigues of ambitious men and political bosses caused senatorial elections to become a stench in the nostrils of all decent and patriotic people. Five States at one time were deprived of one-half of their representation in this body and it is no wonder that the demand for a change in the method of election began to grow stronger and stronger.

To-day four State legislatures are tied up over the election of Senators. Very likely after the 4th of March four of the great States of this Union will be represented only by one-half of the delegation they are entitled to upon this floor.

In addition to this and as really fundamental, the everlasting impulse for self-government asserted itself. The people have begun to feel that they could and should select their agents. They are the State. Their interests are the interests of the State. Mills, factories, houses, lands, railroads, towns, cities, and all are nothing without them. Legislation, government, is of the people, for the people, and by the people. They have felt and they feel now that they are as competent to choose their representatives in this body as they are to choose delegates to choose those representatives, and this really rests at the basis of this demand on the part of the people. It will grow stronger and stronger, and each denial by us will but add to its intensity.

In time the people of this country, if they find that this body will not heed their request and answer their petition and grant them the right to say whether the Constitution shall be amended or not, will take the other method of securing an amendment to the Constitution: They will have a convention called, and when the Constitution comes out of that convention its best friends will not recognize it.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] says the change would take away our direct responsibility to the legislatures who elect us, and transfer it to the people at the polls. Under the present system of electing do we feel any special responsibility to the legislature? We may feel an obligation to some individual member of it or some special faction of our party which has given us material assistance in our election, or it may be inspired it, but I venture to say not even the Senator from New York is thinking of making any special reports to the legislature of his State. The legislature that elects soon passes away; it can not remove us. We even now look to the people for approval of our course and account to them for our stewardship.

But, they say, this is a Government of checks and balances. True; and we must and will maintain these checks and balances not only in the very framework, but we will add another check by the proposed method of selecting our Senators. There is now no check on the legislature. Its election is final, unless bribery and corruption are shown. The man selected may be distasteful to the people, may be distasteful even to the masses of the party to which he belongs; but neither the people nor the party has any recourse. Members of the legislature are too often influenced by reasons other than a desire merely to elect the best man to this high office.

Why is it that the legislatures in four States to-day are tied up over the election of United States Senators? Is it because the members of each legislature are seeking to find the best man for the place? No; it is because of the rivalry of individual candidates and the influences that are exerted in behalf of these particular candidates; and in some of the legislatures the people believe, whether it is true or not, that one man, not a member of the legislature, is really preventing the election of a United States Senator, holding the majority of that legislature in his hand for some particular individual, and that he will not give his permission for these men to exercise their free will and vote as representatives of the people.

Senators, these are some of the reasons why the people are demanding a change in the method of electing Senators. It is not because, as I have said, Senators who have been elected are not able men; it is not because they are not honest men; but it is because the people see that in the State legislatures men are selected not so much for their personal ability, honesty, and capacity to be Members of this great body, but in order to carry out the will of some particular individual or some particular faction or clique.

Personal appeals, personal relations, personal obligations, combinations and trades on local and personal interests, and legislation, now control these elections. Many members of the legislature do not care or expect to be reelected and their responsibility to the people rests lightly on them. Under the proposed method the people will have the final word. If the man nominated is distasteful, or if the methods pursued are not satisfactory, the people can reject. This will not only be a good thing for the people, but it will have a good effect on the candidates and their methods.

It is urged that we should have good, honest men in the legislatures. True, but nothing has done more to demoralize our legislatures than these senatorial contests, and nothing more deters the best men from going there than their dislike to be participants in these contests, and this change will go a long way to improve and strengthen the personnel of our legislatures.

I will not discuss further the merits of the proposition. It is for us simply to say whether or not we will deny again the petition of the people and the States and of the legislatures of the States and refuse to allow them to pass upon the merits of this proposition. Submit this question and, after considering all the reasons for and against, after listening to the Members of this body who may be opposed to the election of Senators by the people and weighing their reasons why the Constitution should not be amended, the legislatures will, in my opinion, say, "The time has come to amend the Constitution in this particular." It is for us to say whether we will deny the petitions and memorials of the legislatures that have elected us, whose dignity and power and consequence some are so desirous of upholding and yet treat with apparent contempt their respectful petitions. Let us show the people that we are their servants and not their masters; their representatives and not their rulers. Let us show them that we believe in their honesty, integrity, intelligence, and capacity for self-government, and that in the last analysis a free and enlightened representative government rests on the "consent of the governed."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the Sutherland amendment or the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I simply wish for a few moments to state the grounds upon which I shall base the vote which I intend to cast upon the resolution.

Mr. President, the question before Congress is not whether Congress shall amend the Constitution so as to provide for the election of Senators by the people—Congress has not the power to do that—but whether we shall submit to the legislatures of the several States a proposition to so amend the Constitution.

The people of this country of both parties and all parties have unmistakably demanded that this question be submitted to them by Congress.

I was opposed to the Sutherland amendment, and I voted against it, but it has been adopted by a decisive majority, and we have got to submit the proposition qualified by that amendment or not submit it at all.

This amendment does not interfere with the constitutional right of Congress to regulate the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Members of the House of Representatives. It simply provides that if Senators are to be elected by the people the Congress shall have the same right of regulation over elections for that purpose as it now has, and always has had, over elections for Members of the House.

The question we have to decide is whether we will take the responsibility of determining this question or submit it to the people for them to determine. I think this is a question which the people should decide through their legislatures, and that a vote against submitting it to them might be misconstrued, and, having gotten the amendment in the best shape we can get it, I for one shall vote to send it to them for such disposition as they see fit to make of it.

I have given very mature consideration to the effect of this amendment, and I am convinced that it will not affect the right of the States to regulate the qualification of voters, and hence will in no way imperil the amendments which have been adopted in the South defining the qualifications of the suffrage.

I do not believe Congress has the power, if it had the disposition, to overthrow these amendments. So far these amendments have been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States whenever they have been challenged before that body, and this amendment does not add to the powers of the Federal Government with respect to the question of suffrage.

The Sutherland amendment addresses itself not to the question of the qualification of voters but solely to the question of regulating the time, place, and manner of holding the election of Senators, if that office is made elective by the people, and it would give the Government no greater power in this regard over the election of Senators than it now has and always has had and will continue to have, whether this resolution is adopted or rejected, over the election of Members of the House of Representatives.

The right of the Government to interfere by way of regulation and supervision of election in the States is derived from three distinct provisions of the Constitution:

First. The one which reserves to Congress the right to regulate the time, place, and manner of election of Members of the House of Representatives, and so forth.

Second. The fifteenth amendment, which prohibits the States in general terms from abridging the right of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Third. The right to throw around the election of Federal officials the safeguards of the Constitution and the law.

It may be, and probably is, true that the Government derives its greatest power of control and regulation over these elections from its right to regulate the "time, place, and manner" of holding them, but it is certain that even in the absence of this specific power and right it would have the right to pass any legislation that it may deem necessary and appropriate to prevent discrimination against the voters by State legislation or administration on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude or to prevent fraud, intimidation, or coercion in the election of Members of the House of Representatives, and of Senators if they are to be elected by popular vote.

If the Congress is disposed to obnoxiously interfere in elections in the States the Sutherland amendment will not change the right in any particular as it affects the election of Members of the House of Representatives and will not deprive it of the right to safeguard the election of Senators by the people against fraud, intimidation, or coercion.

During the more than 40 years that have elapsed since the war and reconstruction Congress has had all the powers over the election of Members of the House of Representatives which the Sutherland amendment now proposes to give it over the election of Senators by the people. During this time sectional and partisan feeling, growing out of the question of Negro enfranchisement and the effect of legislation and administration in restricting Negro suffrage, has run high, and various efforts have been made to put through Congress legislation, such as the force bill, to take over the control of Federal elections in the South; but they have failed, and only that class of legislation has passed which the Government had the power to enact under the fifteenth amendment and under its general powers over the election of its own officials.

No effort to enact legislation of such a sweeping character as it is claimed that Congress has under the fourth article of section 1 as now written has been successful.

During all this while the sentiment against this kind of legislation has been growing stronger, and it is tenfold stronger today than it was when these efforts were made and failed.

I do not believe that Congress will in the future, however broad its powers, likely pass any coercive or restrictive legislation upon this subject more obnoxious to the South than to other sections of the country. Certainly the danger, if any, is remote and speculative.

For one I do not feel willing, because of a vague apprehension of such legislation, justified in voting against this proposition, and thereby denying the people an opportunity to decide for themselves whether they want the proposed amendment in its present form; and I shall therefore vote to leave with them the decision of that question.

Again, it would seem extremely doubtful, from the discussion we have had here, whether the North, East, and West will consent to any amendment looking to the election of Senators by popular vote which does not reserve to the Federal Government the same right of regulation over the election of Senators as obtains over the election of Members of the House; and it would seem that if the people want to obtain the right to elect Senators, it would be under the same condition as obtains under the Constitution as to Members of the House. This situation furnishes another reason why this question should be submitted to the people rather than assume its settlement ourselves, especially as our power is one of submission, while theirs is one of ultimate and final determination.

Mr. BOURNE obtained the floor.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. OWEN. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. OWEN. Before the Senator from Oregon begins, I think it would be advisable to have Senators who are available present. A good many of them are in the cloakrooms.

Mr. BOURNE. I hope the Senator will not press that.

Mr. HALE. I think, Mr. President, it is rather a melancholy spectacle that with such important matters pending as there are here there is nothing but full galleries. Of course we might summon in supernumeraries, but the rules of the Senate do not permit that. Even the press gallery has been abandoned, and I think the Senator is quite right in making his point that there is no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey	Clapp	Kean	Root
Bankhead	Clark, Wyo.	Lorimer	Shively
Beveridge	Crane	McCumber	Smith, Md.
Bourne	Curtis	Martin	Stephenson
Bradley	Depew	Nelson	Stone
Brandegee	Dillingham	Nixon	Sutherland
Briggs	Fletcher	Oliver	Swanson
Brown	Flint	Overman	Warner
Burkett	Foster	Owen	Warren
Burnham	Gallinger	Page	Watson
Burrows	Gamble	Paynter	Wetmore
Burton	Hale	Penrose	Young
Carter	Heyburn	Perkins
Chamberlain	Jones	Piles

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, on the 5th of last May I delivered in this body a speech entitled "Popular v. Delegated Government," in which I asserted that Oregon has the best system of government in the world to-day. The Australian ballot, registration of voters, initiative and referendum, direct primary, corrupt-practices act, and recall, an absolute government by the people.

The interest the Oregon story has created is demonstrated by the fact that already applications have been received for over 2,700,000 copies for the United States, over 10,000 copies in Canada, and several hundred copies for foreign countries.

It is not my intention to take the time of the Senate in giving a repetition of the subject matter contained in the speech referred to, but rather to show that recent and further demonstrations on the part of the electorate of Oregon corroborate the assertions and deductions made in that address.

The issue before the country is whether popular government, with general welfare its vitalizing force, shall save and develop this Nation, or delegated government, with selfishness the destroying force, shall bring the Nation to inevitable anarchy.

For decades we have directed our efforts toward improving the shingles on the roof of our national superstructure without realizing that the foundation is absolutely rotten because its cementation is one of selfishness instead of general welfare, legislation and public servants being directed by and accountable to the political boss and through him to his principal, the largest campaign contributor.

Thus selfishness instead of general welfare becomes the motive power of government. Subservience rather than independence is the doctrine taught by the political boss and temporary leaders. Party platforms are adroitly drawn for the purpose of catching votes rather than for the purpose of development and improvement of government and the conditions of humanity.

The country is to be congratulated upon the awakening it is now undergoing, and, from my viewpoint, the more general and greater the tumult now, the more honest and specific the discussion, the higher the plane of the new departure, and the longer the period of peace hereafter.

The day of party and individual platforms made up of verbal souffle is passing, and the people will elect, whenever they have opportunity, individuals who stand for concrete improvements and remedies and will hold them rigidly responsible for specific performance of their pledges.

PUBLIC SERVANTS SHOULD BE ACCOUNTABLE DIRECTLY TO THE PEOPLE.

The success and duration of representative government depend upon responsibility and accountability—the responsibility of the people for their laws and selection of their public servants and the accountability of the public servant directly to the people.

To insure good service, responsibility and accountability must go together. Whatever an individual is responsible for he should to the same degree be accountable for. Under delegated government he is accountable to the political boss, who in most cases is but the agent of the largest campaign contributor, at best a shifting accountability, because of the relative fluctuations of contributions and contributors. Under popular government like the Oregon system, the accountability is always to the composite citizen—individual unknown—always permanent, never changing, the necessitated result being that the public servant must serve the composite citizen who represents general welfare or be recalled, where the recall exists, or fail of reelection where an efficient direct primary exists.

The greater the centralization of power the wider should be the distribution of accountability. Where accountability is to the individual, payment will be personal, meaning, necessarily, special privilege or serving a selfish interest. Where accountability in government is to the composite citizen—that is to say, the electorate or in corporate business to all the stockholders—the inevitable result is necessitated service for the general welfare of all, or the earliest possible elimination of the servant, whether public or corporate.

WHAT CONSTITUTES POPULAR GOVERNMENT.

These conditions can be established and perpetuated only through popular government, meaning, in its present evolution, the establishment in the several States of our Union, through the utilization of the State machinery, of the initiative and referendum, an efficient direct primary, the corrupt-practices act, and the recall, and providing nationally for the popular selection of candidates for President and Vice President and United States Senators, thus making general welfare the basis of every law and the goal of every public servant.

Popular government insures equal opportunity. It furnishes the same tools to every individual. The progress, advance, or success of the individual depends entirely on his limitations and not on special privilege. Realization of these conditions must stimulate and develop in humanity the innate desire for improvement.

Under delegated government, still in vogue in most States and in practice nationally, the people have no voice in their legislation, thus preventing the development of the electorate; nor have they any voice in the selection of their public servants, thus debauching public service, because of the direct accountability of the public servant to the delegates nominating him and through the delegates to the political boss and through the political boss to the real principal, the greatest campaign contributor.

This is a condition which must result almost necessarily in service by the public servant to the selfish interest governing the campaign contributor, who certainly is not actuated by patriotic motives, but dominated by expectation of receiving in return for his large contribution some special privilege against the general welfare.

In theory we have a Government in which certain public officials represent the wishes and promote the welfare of their States and districts. In reality, we have a Government in which many public officials secure their positions, always by consent and generally through the selection of a party boss, who maintains a political machine with funds contributed by individuals or corporations having selfish interests to protect or promote.

The widespread interest in the Oregon laws proves conclusively that the people of the entire country are awake to conditions that exist and are determined to improve their system of government, not by changing the existing form of government, but by making their representatives solely accountable to the people and by guaranteeing to public servants that demonstration of good service rather than subservience to a political boss, temporary leader, or special interests assures election or retention.

Citizens determined to substitute general welfare and equal opportunity for selfish interest and special privilege are fighting for the adoption of these reforms throughout the country. There may be delays, temporary failures, and disappointments, but the ultimate accomplishment is certain, and the onward sweep of the movement for the full measure of human liberty can not long be stayed.

VALUE OF THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

The initiative and referendum give the people the opportunity of securing and retaining such legislation as they desire. The initiative provides a limitless field for individual development, elevates the electorate, minimizes discontent, and destroys anarchy. The referendum permits popular defeat of unwise laws and absolutely insures retention of laws the people desire, for, without the referendum, the best and most efficient laws ever evolved might be repealed by a legislature actuated by selfish interest or influenced by beneficiaries of special privilege.

The referendum also develops and protects the legislative branch of government through the realization of the legislator that his action will be scrutinized by the people; and, if against general welfare, he will be censured by them and either recalled or defeated for reelection. Under the referendum corruption of members of the legislature is practically eliminated because of the knowledge on the part of the persons desiring special legislation that even though enacted by the legislature, defeat of such laws is within the power of the people.

Until the initiative and referendum amendment has been made a part of every State constitution, its adoption should be the chief issue in every campaign, for other issues sink into insignificance when compared with this.

The initiative and referendum does not destroy, but, on the contrary, insures truly representative government. Where the people of a State enjoy the sovereignty resultant from possession of this legislative power, they will rapidly secure enactment and insure retention of efficient direct primary and corrupt-practices acts and the recall. The legislature still retains and exercises its power, subject, however, to the control of the people, whose servant the legislature should be.

PLACE LEGISLATIVE CANDIDATES ON RECORD.

Because of the fundamental importance of the initiative and referendum, I have urged that in all States direct-legislation leagues be organized and that all candidates for nomination or election to the legislature be compelled to declare unequivocally their attitude upon this subject.

Voters who value their sovereign citizenship and who have confidence in their own intelligence and their own capacity to think and act for themselves should take up the cause aggressively and let no candidate evade the issue. Voters should notify all candidates that they will support for legislative offices only those who pledge themselves to vote for the submission of an initiative and referendum amendment; and legislators in the several States should be notified that they will never again be supported for any office if they fail or refuse to vote for the submission of the initiative and referendum to the people for their adoption.

During the recent campaign I was asked to suggest a form of letter which voters might address to candidates for the legislature, and I suggested the following:

To ———— ————,
Member of ———— Legislature.

If elected a member of the ———— Legislature, will you pledge your honor not only to the people of your legislative district but to the people of the entire State to work and vote for the submission to the electorate of the State of an initiative and referendum amendment similar to the Oregon law? My vote goes only to the candidate replying in the affirmative. In my opinion, this issue overshadows all others.

(Signature of voter.) ———— ————,
(Address.) ————, ————.

In several States where the initiative and referendum was not made an issue in the last campaign, but where it is an issue before the legislature this winter, I have suggested that voters who advocate popular government address a letter in the following form to their State senators and representatives:

Hon. ———— ————,
———— Legislature, ————.

DEAR SIR: In my opinion, the submission of the initiative and referendum is the most important question now before the legislature of the State of ————. A resolution has been introduced proposing the submission of the amendment in the form in which it is now in force in the State of Oregon. I believe that form is best, because the Oregon law has stood the test of practical operation and litigation in the courts. If submitted to popular vote in this State the initiative and referendum will be adopted by an overwhelming majority, for, by adoption of this amendment the people will gain power to control legislation by enacting desirable laws the legislature refuses to enact, and by defeating unwise laws passed by the legislature.

I therefore urge immediate adoption of the initiative and referendum resolution in its original form and will regard any attempted change therein, or delay in adoption, as an indirect effort to defeat the measure.

Believing this issue to be the most important now before the legislature, I shall watch the vote thereon with personal interest and hereby give notice that regardless of party lines, I shall never support or vote for any man for any office if he has failed or refused as a member of the legislature of this State to vote for the submission of the initiative and referendum in the Oregon form.

PEOPLE VOTE WITH DISCRIMINATION.

In my address to the Senate on May 5, I submitted a list of 32 measures which had been voted upon by the people of Oregon, showing that the people had voted honestly and intelligently, had made no mistakes, but had secured desired legislation which they could not secure from the legislature and had defeated unwise laws passed by the legislature.

At the recent election the people of Oregon voted upon 32 measures and the manner in which they did so corroborates the previous evidence that they can and will vote upon these measures with discrimination and with due regard to the merits.

Certain it is that the people of Oregon are thoroughly satisfied with what is known as the "Oregon system," comprising the initiative and referendum, direct primary, corrupt-practices act, and recall, for by a vote of 23,000 for to 60,000 against they defeated a measure submitted by the legislature calling a constitutional convention. There was no general desire that a constitutional convention be held, but enemies of popular government, hoping by this means to eliminate the initiative and referendum from our constitution, secured the legislative passage of this act. Under our constitution no such convention can be held until the act authorizing it has been submitted to and approved by the people. This safeguard enabled the people to defeat the call of a constitutional convention, thus overcoming in its incipiency the effort to eliminate the initiative and referendum from our system of government.

Enemies of popular government criticize the Oregon system because the people of the entire State were compelled to vote upon eight bills creating new counties or changing county boundaries, these questions being only of local interest. These critics lose sight of the fact that submission of these measures to the State at large was due to repeated failures of legislatures to enact laws prescribing the manner in which these questions may be voted upon locally. Some Oregon counties are larger than entire States of the East, and, with our rapidly increasing population, creation of new counties is necessary. However, the people defeated all of the eight county boundary bills, thus showing their disapproval of the submission of local questions to State-wide vote, and their purpose to vote in the negative when not entirely convinced of the desirability of a proposed law.

Of the 32 measures submitted, 9 were approved and 23 rejected. Seven measures were proposed by the legislature and six of these were defeated. I shall not undertake to discuss each of the measures submitted, but for the purpose of showing in briefest possible form the character of measures voted upon by the people of Oregon at the recent election, and the vote upon each, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD the following table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Popular vote on measures submitted to the people of Oregon Nov. 8, 1910.

Amendment permitting three-fourths verdict in civil cases [a]	44,538	39,399

[a] Submitted under the initiative.

Mr. BOURNE. For further illumination of the subject and to refute the misrepresentation regarding the size of the ballot and length of time consumed in voting under the Oregon system, I have here a reprint of the official ballot in Multnomah County, Oreg. The city of Portland, with a population of 207,000, is in Multnomah County, and this is the largest ballot in the State. It is 18 by 24 inches. The time required for the elector to vote this ballot varied from 2½ to 6 minutes.

PRESIDENTIAL PREFERENCE LAW.

Mr. President, the most important measure enacted or adopted by the people of Oregon at the recent election, and, in fact, next to the initiative and referendum the most important law enacted by any State in recent years, is the law permitting voters in party primaries to elect their delegates to national conventions and to instruct them through popular expression of choice for President and Vice President. This law, when enacted in all States, will absolutely destroy the power of a Federal machine to renominate a President or determine his successor. The "steam roller" will be relegated to the political scrap heap and its operators to the shadow of things forgotten, while fourth-class postmasters will, as they should, cease to be a political asset for anybody or any party.

In the light of past experience it seems to me this plan should appeal to all patriotic citizens as well as to conscientious partisans. It is a well-recognized fact that nominations by national conventions are the exclusive work of politicians, which the electorate of the whole United States is permitted only to witness in gaping expectancy and to ratify at the polls in the succeeding November. As unrepresentative as this feature of the national convention is, its flagrancy pales into insignificance in the presence of that other abuse against partisan conscience and outrage upon the representative system, which is wrought by the Republican politician in hopelessly Democratic States, and by the Democratic politician in hopelessly Republican States in dominating the national conventions with the presence of these unrepresentative delegations that represent neither party, people, nor principle.

With the presidential preference law in force throughout the United States the southern Republican delegations will no longer be the vest-pocket trading material of Republican bosses, nor will Democratic delegations from solid Republican States in the North be subject to the will of Democratic bosses. The voice of the people will be heard in the selection of candidates, and delegates will be made, as they should be, mere messengers, conveying the expressed wish of the people whom they profess to represent.

MEANS GREAT INDUSTRIAL SAVING.

Popular selection of candidates for President and Vice President would mean the saving of hundreds of millions of dollars, now wasted through industrial inactivity due to unsettled conditions incident to a change of administration.

In every presidential campaign there is a long period of waste or diminution of full efficiency of brains, muscle, and money due to the uncertainty as to who the presidential nominees will be, then who will be elected, and, last, what the policies of the successful candidate will be after election.

Under the general adoption of my presidential preference bill the people will select in both the great parties the men who by public and private life have demonstrated themselves as best qualified for the highest office in our Nation. Generally, I believe the selections will be from governors of States who have made good executives. Occasionally some man may arise who solves some great problem or originates some new idea improving general welfare, in which event he would be selected and elected. The party electorates would select for their nominees the individuals possessing the confidence of the greatest number, and the general electorate would elect the man in whom they had the greatest confidence. Confidence in our Government is a prerequisite for full business efficiency.

PRESIDENT HAS POWER TO NOMINATE SUCCESSOR.

Three years ago we had a convincing exhibition of the power of a President to dictate the selection of his successor. At that time three-fourths of the Republican voters of my State were in favor of the renomination of Mr. Roosevelt, and, believing that their wishes should be observed, I endeavored to secure a delegation from that State favorable to his nomination for a second elective term. But through the tremendous power of the Chief Executive and of the Federal machine the delegates selected by our State convention were instructed for Mr. Taft. After the delegates were elected and instructed a poll was taken by one of the leading newspapers in Portland, which city contains nearly one-third of the entire population of the State. The result indicated that the preference of the people of the State was 11 to 1 in favor of Mr. Roosevelt as against Mr. Taft.

Impressed by this demonstration of the power of the President to thwart the will of the people, I realized that such power in the hands of any man is a serious menace to a truly representative government. Consequently, I tried to evolve a plan to destroy such power, and after much thought conceived the idea of enlarging our direct-primary law so that each voter may directly express his choice for President and Vice President. Accordingly I had a bill for such a law prepared and submitted to the people under the initiative. In order to make the system complete, the bill also provided for direct election of delegates to national conventions and direct nomination of candidates for presidential electors. It provided that the State shall pay the actual traveling expenses of delegates to national conventions, not exceeding $200 for each delegate, thus removing the handicap which practically permits only men of wealth or leisure to attend national conventions.

The initiative bill, incorporating these provisions, was opposed by almost every prominent newspaper in the State and by all the machine politicians. In order to deceive the people and prejudice them against the bill, one of the papers of largest circulation represented that its chief purpose was to compel the State to pay the traveling expenses of delegates to national conventions. This feature and the idea of needless expense was kept before the voters, and the real issue, extension of popular government, was concealed. Nevertheless, the measure was adopted by the people, and since its adoption it has been praised by some of those who fought it during the campaign. This law is not long, and because of its importance in national affairs I ask permission to insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BOURNE. I will say to the Senator I prefer not to yield until I finish my speech. When I get through I shall be very glad, to the best of my ability, to answer any question.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is presenting a program, a very large and desirable one, which will almost bring about a political millenium. I wish he would explain the provisions of this scheme of his that will prevent, in the national convention, representatives of the administration, whichever it may be, Democratic or Republican, who represent no electoral votes but are counted whether in one convention of the Republicans or in the other convention of the Democrats—delegates who represent nobody, and yet who may control the choice.

Mr. BOURNE. I will say to the Senator from Maine that if he will be patient I hope to demonstrate to him not a scheme but a plan by which the desideratum he mentions will be accomplished.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I shall decline to be interrupted any further until I finish my remarks.

Mr. HALE. I wish that that brief statute may be read. Let the Secretary read it.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I decline to be interrupted. I will be glad, at the conclusion of my remarks, as I stated before, to answer any question to the best of my ability, and I should like to have the courtesy of the Senate extended to me to go on until I complete them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor and can only be interrupted by his consent.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator decline to have read for the benefit of the Senate what he says is a brief statute that will cover this whole question? If he declines to have it read for the benefit of the Senate, the responsibility is with him, not with me. All I ask is that it shall be read.

Mr. BOURNE. Of course, I am perfectly willing to have it read.

Mr. HALE. The Senator need not read it.

Mr. BOURNE. I have no intention of reading it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

PRESIDENTIAL PREFERENCE LAW.

A bill for a law to amend section 2 of the direct primary nominating elections law which was proposed by initiative petition and approved by the people of Oregon at the general election in June, 1904, and printed in the volume of the General Laws of Oregon for the year 1905 at pages 7 to 50 thereof; to provide for the expression by the qualified voters of the several political parties subject to the said direct primary law of their choice for nomination by their party for President and Vice President of the United States; to provide for and regulate direct primary nominating elections for the election of said political parties' delegates to their respective national conventions, and for the payment of such delegates' necessary expenses, not exceeding $200 for any delegate; for the nomination of party candidates for the office of presidential elector; for space in the party and State campaign books to set forth the merits of aspirants for election and for nomination, and of candidates for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States, of candidates for offices to be voted for in the State at large, and of candidates for United States Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Be it enacted by the people of the State of Oregon:

SECTION 1. That section 2 of the direct primary nominating elections law, which was proposed by initiative petition and enacted by the people of Oregon at the general election in June, 1904, as the same is printed in the volume of the General Laws of Oregon for the year 1905, at pages 7 to 50 thereof, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

SEC. 2. On the forty-fifth day preceding any election (except special elections to fill vacancies, presidential elections, municipal elections in towns or cities having a population of less than 2,000, and school elections) at which public officers in this State and in any district or county, and in any city having a population of 2,000 or more at which public officers are to be elected, except as provided in section 6 of this law as to time in certain cities and towns, a primary nominating election shall be held in accordance with this law in the several election precincts comprised within the territory for which such officers are to be elected at the ensuing election, which shall be known as the primary nominating election, for the purpose of choosing candidates by the political parties, subject to the provisions of this law, for Senator in Congress and all other elective State, district, county, precinct, city, ward, and all other officers and delegates to any constitutional convention or conventions that may hereafter be called, who are to be chosen at the ensuing election wholly by electors within this State or any subdivision of this State, and also for choosing and electing the county central committeemen by the several parties subject to the provisions of this law:

Provided, (a) In the years when a President and Vice President of the United States are to be elected, said primary nominating election shall be held on the forty-fifth day before the first Monday in June of said year; and all laws pertaining to the nomination of candidates, registration of voters, and all other things incident and pertaining to the holding of the regular biennial nominating election, shall be enforced and effected the same number of days before the first Monday in June that they were under the said nominating-election law immediately before the change in the date of the regular election from the first Monday in June to the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November.

(b) When candidates for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States are to be nominated, every qualified elector of a political party subject to this law shall have opportunity to vote his preference, on his party nominating ballot, for his choice for one person to be the candidate of his political party for President, and one person to be the candidate of his political party for Vice President of the United States, either by writing the names of such persons in blank spaces to be left on said ballot for that purpose, or by marking with a cross before the printed names of the persons of his choice, as in the case of other nominations. The names of any persons shall be so printed on said ballots solely on the petition of their political supporters in Oregon, without such persons themselves signing any petition, signature, or acceptance. The names of persons in such political party who shall be presented by petition of their supporters for nomination to be party candidates for the office of President or Vice President of the United States shall be printed on the nominating official ballot, and the ballots shall be marked, and the votes shall be counted, convassed, and returned in like manner and under the same conditions as to names, petitions, and other matters, as far as the same are applicable, as the names and petitions of aspirants for the party nominations for the office of governor and for United States Senator in Congress are or may be by law required to be marked, filed, counted, canvassed, and returned.

(c) The members of the political parties subject to this law shall elect their party delegates to their national conventions for the nomination of their party candidates for President and Vice President of the United States, and shall nominate candidates for their party presidential electors at such nominating election. The governor shall grant a certificate of election to each of the delegates so elected, which certificates shall show the number of votes received in the State by each person of such delegate's political party for nomination as its candidate for President and Vice President. Nominating petitions for the office of delegate to the respective party national conventions, to be chosen and elected at said nominating election, shall be sufficient if they contain a number of signatures of the members of the party equal to 1 per cent of the party vote in the State at the last preceding election for Representative in Congress; provided that not more than 500 signatures shall be required on any such petition. Every qualified voter shall have the right at such nominating election to vote for the election of one person and no more to the office of national delegate for his party, and to vote for the nomination of one aspirant and no more for the office of presidential elector as the candidate of his party. A number of such candidates equal to the number of delegates to be elected by each party which is subject to the provisions of this law, receiving, respectively, each for himself, the highest number of votes for such office, shall be thereby elected. Every political party subject to the provisions of this law shall be entitled to nominate, at said nominating election, as many candidates for the office of presidential elector as there are such officers to be elected; that number of aspirants in every such party who shall receive, respectively, each for himself, the highest number of votes of his party for that nomination, shall be thereby nominated as a candidate of his political party for the office of presidential elector.

(d) Every delegate to a national convention of a political party recognized as such organization by the laws of Oregon shall receive from the State treasury the amount of his traveling expenses necessarily spent in actual attendance upon said convention, as his account may be audited and allowed by the secretary of state, but in no case to exceed $200 for each delegate: Provided, That such expenses shall never be paid to any greater number of delegates of any political party than would be allowed such party under the plan by which the number of delegates to the Republican national convention was fixed for the Republican Party of Oregon in the year 1908. The election of such national delegates for political parties not subject to the direct primary nominating elections law shall be certified in like manner as nominations of candidates of such political parties for elective public offices. Every such delegate to a national convention to nominate candidates for President and Vice President shall subscribe an oath of office that he will uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State of Oregon, and that he will, as such officer and delegate, to the best of his judgment and ability, faithfully carry out the wishes of his political party as expressed by its voters at the time of his election.

(e) The committee or organization which shall file a petition to place the name of any person on the nominating ballot of their political party to be voted for by its members for expression of their choice for nomination as the candidate of such party for President or Vice President of the United States shall have the right, upon payment therefor, to four pages of printed space in the campaign books of such political party provided for by sections 4 and 5 of the law proposed by initiative petition and enacted by the people of Oregon at the general election in June, 1908, entitled "A bill to propose by initiative petition a law to limit candidates' election expenses; to define, prevent, and punish corrupt and illegal practices in nominations and elections; to secure and protect the purity of the ballot; to amend section 2775 of Bellinger and Cotton's Annotated Codes and Statutes of Oregon; to provide for furnishing information to the electors and to provide the manner of conducting contests for nominations and elections in certain cases," as printed on pages 15 to 38 of the General Laws of Oregon for the year 1909. In this space said committee shall set forth their statement of the reasons why such person should be voted for and chosen by the members of their party in Oregon and in the Nation as its candidate. Any qualified elector of any such political party who favors or opposes the nomination of any person by his own political party as its candidate for President or Vice President of the United States may have not exceeding four pages of space in his aforesaid party nominating campaign book, at a cost of $100 per printed page, to set forth his reasons therefor.

(f) Every person regularly nominated by a political party, recognized as such by the laws of Oregon, for President or Vice President of the United States, or for any office to be voted for by the electors of the State at large, or for Senator or Representative in Congress, shall be entitled to use four pages of printed space in the State campaign book provided for by sections 6 and 7 of the above-entitled "Law to limit candidates' election expenses; to define, prevent, and punish corrupt and illegal practices in nominations and elections; to secure and protect the purity of the ballot; to amend section 2775 of Bellinger and Cotton's Annotated Codes and Statutes of Oregon; to provide for furnishing information to the electors and to provide the manner of conducting contests for nominations and elections in certain cases," as printed on pages 15 to 38 of the volume of the General Laws of Oregon for 1909. In this space the candidate or his supporters, with his written permission filed with the secretary of state, may set forth the reasons why he should be elected. No charge shall be made against candidates for President and Vice President of the United States for this printed space. The other candidates above named shall pay at the rate of $100 per printed page for said space, and said payment shall not be counted as a part of the 10 per cent of one year's salary that each candidate is allowed to spend for campaign purposes. If this bill shall be approved by the people, the title of the bill shall stand as the title of the law.

DESTROYS POWER OF FEDERAL MACHINE.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, as previously indicated, whenever this law becomes nation-wide in its application it will absolutely destroy the power of the Federal machine; prevent a President renominating himself, except by demonstration of good service; destroy the possibility of any President naming his successor, and relieve him of any obligations to political bosses, campaign contributors, national committeemen, or national delegates, thus transferring the obligation from any known individual to the composite citizen, where it belongs.

Mr. President, as previously indicated, whenever this law becomes nation-wide in its application it will absolutely destroy the power of the Federal machine; prevent a President renominating himself, except by demonstration of good service; destroy the possibility of any President naming his successor, and relieve him of any obligations to political bosses, campaign contributors, national committeemen, or national delegates, thus transferring the obligation from any known individual to the composite citizen, where it belongs.

Mr. President, the charge that the President of the United States has used his appointing power to coerce Members of Congress is the most serious of all attacks made by the press. The accusation was made in recent months that in an effort to dictate to Members of Congress in what manner they should exercise their legislative power, the President had granted them the privilege of recommending persons for Federal appointment in their respective States, if the Members voted in Congress as he desired, and had refused them this privilege if they voted upon measures in such a manner as to displease him. In other words, it was charged that the President of the United States engaged in a systematic trading of patronage for votes in Congress.

Reduced to its simple element, the charge was, in effect, bribery or intimidation—bribery if patronage was extended as a reward for voting in accordance with the wishes of the Executive, and intimidation if patronage was withheld as punishment for refusal to yield unwilling obedience. The charge was a direct attack upon the honesty of the Executive, and indirectly a reflection upon the intelligence, independence, and courage of Members of Congress. It would be difficult to believe such a charge without positive proof.

EVIDENCE OF MISUSE OF PATRONAGE.

According to the New York Evening Post of September 15, 1910, the following letter was sent by Secretary Norton to a Republican leader in Iowa whose name was not disclosed:

BEVERLY, MASS., September 15, 1910.

Your letters of the 9th are at hand, and I have delayed replying until after the primary elections. The President directs me to express to you and to your friends his deep appreciation of the work which you have done, and the powerful assistance which you have extended to the administration from the beginning—an assistance that has contributed much to the legislative and other successes which have been secured. The President recognizes that your efforts have been wholly disinterested, that you have fought sturdily and generously for what you believed to be his interest and the welfare and success of the party.

While Republican legislation pending in Congress was opposed by certain Republicans, the President felt it to be his duty to the party and to the country to withhold Federal patronage from certain Senators and Congressmen who seemed to be in opposition to the administration's efforts to carry out the promises of the party platform. That attitude, however, ended with the primary elections and nominating conventions, which have now been held, and in which the voters have had opportunity to declare themselves. The people have spoken, and, as the party faces the fall elections, the question must be settled by Republicans of every shade of opinion, whether the differences of the last session shall be perpetuated or shall be forgotten.

He recognizes the danger that in certain cases expressions of feeling were so intense as to make it difficult in some instances for factions to come together and work loyally for the party; but, as he stated in his letter to the Republican congressional committee, he believes it can be done and should be done. The President is confident that you will yourselves meet your local and State situation in this spirit, and that you will write to your friends and ask them to do likewise.

The President feels that the value of Federal patronage has been greatly exaggerated, and that the refusal to grant it has probably been more useful to the men affected than the appointments would have been. In the preliminary skirmishes in certain States, like Wisconsin and Iowa and elsewhere, he was willing, in the interests of what the leaders believed would lead to party success, to make certain discriminations, but the President has concluded that it is his duty now to treat all Republican Congressmen and Senators alike, without any distinction. He will now follow the usual rule in Republican congressional districts and States, and follow the recommendations made by Republican Congressmen and Senators of whatever shade of political opinion, only requiring that the men recommended shall be good men, the most competent, and the best fitted for the particular office.

Sincerely, yours,

CHARLES D. NORTON,
Secretary to the President.

Since this letter was signed by the Private Secretary to the President, purports to have been written by his direction, and, although five months have elapsed, has not been repudiated, must it not be accepted as stating the facts?

LEGISLATIVE POWER VESTED IN CONGRESS.

Before entering upon the duties of his office, the President of the United States took an oath, pledging himself to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. Section 1, Article I, of that Constitution declares:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Yet we have the charge that the President exercised legislative power by coercing Members of Congress through distribution of patronage.

The entire spirit and letter of the Constitution shows clear intention that Congress shall be free from intimidation—that it was the purpose that Congress should make the laws and that the President should execute them. Indeed, section 6 of Article I declares that for any speech or debate in Congress Members shall not be questioned in any other place. While it is not permitted that Members be punished by fine or imprisonment for speech or debate in Congress, it has been charged that the President of the United States rewarded them or punished them through the distribution of patronage.

VIOLATION OF SPIRIT OF BRIBERY STATUTE.

I have said that the charge against the President is, in effect, either bribery or intimidation. I would not be understood as saying that it is a charge of technical violation of the bribery statute, but rather a violation of its spirit. In order that this phase of the subject may be clear, I wish to quote the section of the Revised Statutes upon the subject of bribery of Members of Congress. It is section 5450, and reads as follows:

SEC. 5450. Every person who promises, offers, gives, or causes or procures to be promised, offered, or given, any money or any other thing of value, or makes or tenders any contract, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, or security for the payment of money, or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value, to any Member of either House of Congress, either before or after such Member has been qualified or has taken his seat, with intent to influence his vote or decision on any question, matter, cause, or proceeding which may be at any time pending in either House of Congress, or before any committee thereof, shall be fined not more than three times the amount of money or value of the thing so offered, promised, given, made, or tendered, or caused or procured to be so offered, promised, given, made, or tendered, and shall be, moreover, imprisoned not more than three years.

You will observe, Mr. President, that bribery consists in the delivery of "anything of value" and "with intent to influence his vote." Skilled lawyers, trained to "divide a hair twixt south and southwest side," would find no difficulty in proving by unquestionable logic that Federal patronage is not a thing of value, notwithstanding it is so highly prized by operators in commercial politics. What Members of this body may think of the question whether Federal patronage is a thing of value is perhaps beside the question, for they will not be called upon to decide it unless the House should some time exercise its power to impeach a President for delivering patronage with intent to influence the action of Members of Congress.

The natural inference from the Norton letter is that the President of the United States used Federal patronage to influence the action of Members of Congress. This is a charge which no citizen can discuss without regret, yet the whole subject is of such vital importance in the preservation of representative government that I would feel remiss in my duty if I failed to call it to the attention of the country and place in available form such information relating thereto as may have come to my attention. The undenied statement indicates a deplorable and despicable subservience upon the part of the legislative branch and a dangerous and demoralizing usurpation upon the part of the Executive.

If democratic government in the United States is yielding place to dictatorship, then the people should be informed of the transition and aroused to the necessity for prompt exercise of that eternal vigilance and courageous self-assertion which are the price of continued liberty.

The manner in which Federal patronage shall be used is of greatest concern not to Members of Congress but to the people of the United States, whose Government this is. Senators and Representatives come and go. It is of comparatively little importance whether any one of us shall be here six years hence or two years hence. Individuals are of little consequence. But fundamental principles of justice and equality under law are of utmost importance. Disregard and defiance of law is the beginning of anarchy, and the law-respecting, liberty-loving people of this country will not tolerate it.

EQUALITY BEFORE THE LAW.

Our Government was founded upon the proposition that all men are equal before the law, civil or criminal. I would have as much respect for a common ward heeler who buys votes at the polls as for a President of the United States who uses his appointing power as a means of forcing or persuading Members of Congress to determine or change their course of action. One transaction is as dishonest, as corrupt, and as depraving as the other, but the latter is more dangerous, more insidious, more pernicious than the former, because it strikes at the very foundation of free institutions, sets a precedent for corrupt methods in all official life, and marks the beginning of dictatorship and decadence of the Nation.

It is interesting to note that the truth of the charge of corruption, in high places as well as low, has been established not so much by external proof as by the confessions of parties thereto. The purchase of votes in the Illinois Legislature was not proven by testimony of outside parties, but by confessions of bribe givers and bribe takers. In Ohio, where thousands of voters have been punished for selling their votes, and where punishment of vote buyers will doubtless follow in due time, convictions have been based almost entirely upon confessions. And the same is true with regard to the charge of purchase of votes in Congress through distribution of patronage. The charge was practically unproven, whatever the general understanding may have been, until the issuance of the famous Beverly letter, in which, if authentic, it is confessed that the President had given the privilege of controlling patronage to those Members of Congress who voted upon legislation in accordance with his wishes and has withheld it from those who did not.

PRESIDENTIAL OATH FORBIDS COERCION.

Legislative power is vested in a Senate and House of Representatives, and if that power is to be exercised honestly and intelligently the members of the two Houses must be free to vote in accordance with their own best judgment, being held accountable only to the people of their own States. Any interference with the free expression of the opinions of Members of Congress by their votes upon measures is a direct attack upon that section of the Constitution which declares that—

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

This quotation is part of that Constitution which every President of the United States has taken an oath to "preserve, protect, and defend." No President can interfere with the exercise of legislative power by Congress without violating his oath of office, a violation as direct and as complete as any other unlawful act by any other officer of the Government. To bribe a Member of Congress by means of Federal patronage is not different in principle from bribery by means of cash or other valuable consideration. Intimidation by threats of loss of prestige incident to withdrawal of patronage is not different in principle from intimidation by threats of violence or business injury. But this species of bribery and intimidation is more vicious than any other, because it assumes a character of gentility, due to the patriotic reverence for the office of President, not enjoyed by the common ward heeler when he indulges in similar practices. It is too base to be called a crime. It is so far below the conception of lawmakers that no statute has been enacted directly prohibiting it. Nothing in our Constitution or laws expressly prohibits the President from trading Federal appointments for votes in Congress. The special-privilege seeker trying to influence legislation by offers of reward to Members of Congress must be fined or imprisoned. The bribe giver is the greatest enemy of good government, and experience has so strongly demonstrated the need for untrammeled official action that many of the States are regulating the activities of paid lobbyists. An honest ballot, whether at the polls or in State legislatures or in the Halls of Congress, is absolutely necessary to free government.

The possible corruption of Congress through the misuse of the presidential nominating power was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution nor national legislators. It would indeed be a most humiliating admission of the weakness of representative government if disclosures necessitate legislative action to prevent a repetition of such an evil.

One remedy would be the enactment of a Federal corrupt-practices act, punishing by forfeiture of office and imprisonment any Federal official who promises or bestows patronage for votes or support in either legislation, primaries, conventions, or elections.

CREATES MACHINE FOR SELF-PERPETUATION.

But, Mr. President, the use of the appointing power to influence the action of Members of Congress is only one means by which this power may be abused. Federal patronage is also an effective and dangerous power when wielded for the creation or maintenance of a political machine with the purpose of forcing renomination of an Executive or the nomination of a man of his choice.

The President of the United States, through his power of nominating Federal appointees, is the head of the greatest political machine the world has ever seen. Whether the President be a shrewd politician directing the machine himself or entirely ignorant of politics and delegating the power to another, the system is most pernicious.

GOVERNMENTAL AND CORPORATE EFFICIENCY.

Actuated by a desire to submit to the country authoritative figures showing the number of Federal officeholders and employees subject to the nominating and removal powers of the President of the United States, I introduced in the Senate, on December 21, 1910, a resolution which was adopted by the Senate and which reads as follows (S. Res. 312):

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to furnish to the Senate for its use, if he does not deem it incompatible with public interest, the following information, with departmental classifications of the same:

First. The total number of appointments which are made by the President upon nomination to and confirmation by the Senate.

Second. The total number of appointments which are made by the President, but which do not require nomination to and confirmation by the Senate.

Third. The total number of officers and employees of the Government subject to civil-service regulations, specifying classification and number of postmasters.

Fourth. The total number of officers and employees subject to removal by the President without action on the part of Congress.

Fifth. The total number of officers and employees of the United States Government, exclusive of enlisted men and officers of the Army and Navy.

I assumed that the governmental system of accounts would make this information readily obtainable, but 65 days elapsed before the information was transmitted to the Senate, being received the evening of February 24, 1911, after I had prepared this address.

On February 9, desiring to ascertain from some of the largest business organizations in this country the length of time necessary to secure information of this nature for the purpose of comparison with governmental efficiency, I sent the following letter to Mr. John D. Archbold, of the Standard Oil; Mr. Elbert H. Gary, of the United States Steel; and Mr. Robert C. Clowry, of the Western Union Telegraph Co.

DEAR SIR: Some time ago I introduced in the Senate, and the Senate adopted, a resolution requesting the President to furnish to the Senate the following information, with departmental classifications of the same:

First. The total number of appointments which are made by the President upon nomination to and confirmation by the Senate.

Second. The total number of appointments which are made by the President, but which do not require nomination to and confirmation by the Senate.

Third. The total number of officers and employees of the Government subject to civil-service regulations, specifying classification and number of postmasters.

Fourth. The total number of officers and employees subject to removal by the President without action on the part of Congress.

Fifth. Total number of officers and employees of the United States Government exclusive of enlisted men and officers of the Army and Navy.

The President referred this request to the head of each department with a request that the information be supplied.

I think that in number of employees one of the departments would correspond very closely to your company. In order to determine the relative efficiency in organization, I would like to ask you how long it would take you to supply similar information regarding persons employed by your company.

You will note that the resolution does not call for information regarding compensation, but merely the number and classification.

I shall thank you for your kindness in giving this information.

Very sincerely, yours, JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr.

CORPORATIONS REPLY.

On February 14 Mr. Archbold replied as follows:

I have your favor of the 9th. Answering your query as nearly as I can: If it means our force of officers, managers, and clerks—the force receiving not less than $50 per month—it could be supplied in three days. If it means the entire list of employees down to the laboring men, it might take three weeks, owing to the Standard's world-wide foreign branches.

On February 17 Mr. Newcomb Carlton, vice president of the Western Union Telegraph Company, replied as follows:

Replying to your inquiry of the 9th instant, addressed to Mr. Robert C. Clowry, the former president of this company, I beg to say that the time required for supplying information of the character mentioned respecting Western Union employees of various grades, would depend entirely upon whether the classifications under which the information was called for agreed with the classifications under which our record of employees is kept.

We keep at division headquarters (each division corresponding to one of the Federal departments in so far as organization is concerned), a classified list of all employees, and each divisional chief officer could supply the information required in a few minutes if the classification fitted. If, however, the classification contemplated in the inquiry were different from our record, making it necessary to go down the line of our 23,000 offices to get at the information, I should judge that in an ordinary case it would take several weeks to collect and arrange the information if the mails were used. If the inquiry were conducted by telegraph it could, of course, be done in a few days at the outside.

As yet I have received no reply from Mr. Gary.

In view of the ability of the Standard Oil and the Western Union to furnish promptly statistics regarding their organizations, the failure of the administrative branch of the Government to earlier furnish the requested information indicates that the Government's departments were either unwilling to give the Senate the statistics desired or their organization must be inefficient.

It is hardly conceivable that the administrative branch of our Government would refuse or delay compliance with this request coming from the United States Senate, hence the deduction that some of the large business corporations of the country enjoy far greater efficiency than the administrative branch of our Government.

I take this opportunity of publicly expressing to Mr. John D. Archbold and his company, the Standard Oil, and to Mr. Newcomb Carlton and his company, the Western Union Telegraph, my appreciation of their courtesy in so promptly replying to my letter of inquiry. I also commend the efficient and intelligent method under which their business is conducted, as evidenced by their ability to ascertain so quickly facts similar to those the administration was so long in securing or in imparting to the Senate.

Mr. President, my inability to earlier obtain through the President the information requested in the Senate resolution previously quoted prevents my giving the clear presentation I had hoped to do on the subject. However, by next session of Congress I expect, judging from present indications, that the country itself will have far more data, and I shall then probably take opportunity to make further remarks on this subject.

MAGNITUDE OF THE MACHINE.

Statistics compiled by the Civil Service Commission, but acknowledged to be incomplete, show that on June 30, 1910, the number of employees in the executive civil service was 384,088. This does not include officers or enlisted men of the Army or Navy, nor clerks in fourth-class post offices, the latter numbering about 64,000.

Although approximately 222,000 of this number are on the classified list under civil-service regulations, yet the presidential power of nomination or direct or indirect appointment of nearly 68,000 not on the classified list under the civil-service regulations, and his power of promotion, demotion, or removal, either of minor employees or the heads or subheads of departments makes the whole number of 384,000 directly or indirectly responsive to his will. While authentic information is not at hand, I believe the average wage in the Government service is at least $900 per annum, making a total Government pay roll of more than $345,000,000.

The utilization of this force along selfish lines would be most dangerous, pernicious, and demoralizing. An Executive desiring to misuse this power would, in effect, start with a campaign contribution of $345,000,000 per annum and an organization of 384,000 individuals, all directed toward selfish interest, namely, perpetuation of the power of the Executive and of the individuals owing their position and advancement to this power.

While the President is the actual head of the Federal machine, the chairman of the national committee or a Cabinet officer, or both in one, is usually his chief agent for its operation. Backed by the presidential power to distribute Federal patronage, he starts his organization with the committeemen from Districts and Territories having no votes and from those Southern States that always deliver delegates but never deliver electoral votes to the Republican Party. In fact, under the operation of this machine electoral votes are not desired, because if obtained and Republican Senators and Congressmen were elected from Southern States these Members of Congress would apparently have to be consulted regarding the distribution of Federal patronage in their respective States, and the "referees" in those States would lose their power.

INEQUALITY IN NATIONAL COMMITTEE.

The Republican national committee consists of 53 members, one from each State, Territory, District, and island possession. The Territory of Alaska, with no electoral vote and but two delegates in the convention, has the same representation and power in the national committee as the great State of New York, with 39 electoral votes and 78 delegates. The committee elects its own chairman and perfects its organization. It decides on place and time of convention. It recommends how many delegates shall be admitted from each State and Territory, how the delegates and alternates shall be chosen in the various States, how the delegates from Territories shall be selected, and recommends who shall serve as temporary chairman of the national convention. The chairman of the national committee calls the convention to order and generally directs the campaign.

In the Republican national convention committees on credentials, permanent organization, and resolutions are composed of one delegate from each State and Territory. Each State selects its own representative on these committees and offers them to the convention. The committee on permanent organization recommends the permanent chairman and confirms the other officers who are recommended by the national committee. Control of the national committee by the administration gives tremendous power, which is made absolute if combined with control of the committee on credentials. If the operators of the machine find that, even with the advantage of control of delegations from the Democratic States and the Territories, they will not have enough votes in the convention to control its action, contesting delegations will appear from a number of States, by seating some of which the necessary additional strength may be secured.

CONVENTIONS NOT TRULY REPRESENTATIVE.

National conventions are not representative of the wishes of the members of the party who are depended upon to cast the votes to elect the ticket. In the 1908 Republican national convention 980 delegates were admitted under the terms of the national committee's call; 491, or a majority, were necessary for a nomination. The Southern States and Territories, giving no electoral votes, with the exception of Maryland, which gave Taft and Sherman 2 out of 8, had 338 votes, leaving 153 to be secured to give a majority. Thus, it will be seen that under such circumstances any candidate controlling the delegations from Southern Democratic States and the Territories would have to secure only 153 votes, while any other candidate would have to secure 491 votes from those States which give electoral votes as well as delegates.

Under the referee system in the South and the patronage system in the Territories and insular possessions a President, through his nominating power and the Federal machine, can, if he desires, practically control the votes of these delegations in a convention. Then with his power in other States, and the tremendous influence of the Federal machine, it requires but little other influence to give him the 153 additional votes necessary for his renomination or the nomination of the man he selects. The Southern States and Territories, giving no electoral votes to the Republican Party, are under the domination of the machine through the referee system, and have greater influence in naming the Republican nominees for President and Vice President than have the combined States of New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Massachusetts, Indiana, and Iowa, which collectively have 334 delegates.

EXISTENCE OF THIS POWER IS UNDEMOCRATIC.

Possession of such power as I have outlined (the existence of which can not be disputed) violates the fundamental principles of a Government established and maintained by all the people. Avoidance of dictatorial power was the chief purpose of division of the Government into three branches. Yet men who profess reverence for the founders of the Government give silent or express consent to usurpation and misuse of that power for self-perpetuation.

It was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that Congress, within the limitations of that instrument, should represent the will of the people; that the Supreme Court, taking the Federal Constitution as the standard, should determine the validity and meaning of laws enacted by Congress, and that the President should be the instrument to carry out the will of the people as expressed through Congress.

Though the power of each branch was defined and Congress was declared the lawmaking body, yet for years we have seen the power of the Executive steadily increasing and the power of Congress correspondingly diminishing. The means by which this has been accomplished is the nominating power of the President of the United States. This steadily increasing power of the Executive and decreasing power of Congress is the greatest menace to the perpetuation of free government and general welfare of our people.

Extension of the power of the Executive is the beginning of dictatorship. The remedy is to make Presidents directly accountable to party and general electorates by enacting laws for presidential primary votes, thereby destroying the power of political bosses and their backers, the campaign contributors. The people can be trusted. The composite citizen knows more and acts from higher motives than any single individual, however great, experienced, or well developed. While selfishness is usually dominant in the individual, it is minimized in the composite citizen.

COMPOSITE CITIZEN IS UNSELFISH.

The composite citizen is made up of millions of individuals, each dominated in most cases by selfish interest. But because of the difference in the personal equations of the individual units making up the composite citizen, there is a corresponding difference in the interests dominating said units, and while composite action is taking place, friction is developed, attrition results, selfishness is worn away, and general welfare is substituted before action is accomplished.

I therefore assert that it is of greatest importance to this Government and Nation that Congress, made up of hundreds of different individuals representing different sections of our great country, especially when made responsible under the general establishment of popular government laws to the party and general electorates of their districts and States, knowing no single individual or interest to whom they owe their selection or election, should be the untrammeled legislative branch of our Government, as most responsive to the composite citizen and possessing collectively more knowledge, experience, reason, and unselfishness than any single individual.

CONCRETE REMEDIES SUGGESTED.

The presidential preference law, generally enacted, will destroy the power of the President to build a Federal machine.

The misuse of Federal patronage in coercing Congress can be prevented by an efficient national corrupt-practices act, which I expect to introduce in the next Congress, or by constitutional amendment transferring the presidential power of nomination to a permanent nonpartisan commission to be created, or putting the responsibility for such selections upon Senators and Congressmen. Until legislative action be taken or a constitutional amendment be adopted, my own idea would be for the Senate to decline to confirm presidential nominations in any State if unsatisfactory to Senators from the State in which the appointment is made. This action by the Senate would absolutely destroy the existing referee system in the South, for the delegates to national conventions from Southern States would realize that the referee's promises of patronage in return for their votes for the administration's candidate for President could not be fulfilled without the Senate's assent and cooperation.

As long as I remain in the Senate I shall never vote for the confirmation of any executive nominee who is objectionable to the Senators in the State where the nominee is to serve.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES SHOULD DECLARE ATTITUDE.

Mr. President, I hope the crystallization of public opinion against the misuse of this power will force presidential candidates in both parties to publicly announce, prior to their nomination or election, that if elected they will place upon Senators and Congressmen the responsibility for making selections of all Federal appointees in their respective States. Such a plan would be based on the assumption that Senators and Congressmen are better qualified to judge as to the efficiency and fitness of citizens in their States than the President himself or any delegated agent could possibly be. This arrangement, from every viewpoint, would give better service. The possibility of the Senators and Congressmen misusing such a power would be minimized by the realization that they would be held more strictly accountable by their constituents, in case of making poor selections, than would the President. If this nominating power is to be misused, it is infinitely less menace to the country to have it divided among 92 Senators and 391 Congressmen than to have it centralized in one man, as it now is in the President, or delegated by him to a member of his cabinet or the chairman of the national committee, or both in one.

THE SYSTEM, NOT AN INDIVIDUAL, CRITICIZED.

Mr. President, in view of my well-known advocacy of the largest possible power in the hands of the people and in view of the manner in which I have discussed this subject, it seems hardly necessary to assert that my criticism is aimed not at an individual, but at a system, the existence of which is heralded by an individual's proclamation. I care not who is the originator or promulgator of an idea, a fundamental, or a law, or who its opponents, if, upon mature deliberation, it appears to be for the general welfare, I shall support it, while if it seems to be against the general welfare I shall oppose it.

Due respect for the high office of President of the United States is becoming to every citizen, but higher than that office and vastly higher than any temporary incumbent is the Constitution of the United States, and above and beyond that the eternal principles of human liberty and justice. I am no worshiper of men or offices, nor do I believe constitutions can not be improved. If men interrupt the progress of society, their sphere of activity must be changed; if offices become an injury rather than a help to government, the powers incident thereto must be altered; if constitutions fail in their purpose to promote the general welfare, new provisions must be written therein. All these are but temporary and shifting instruments, no more fit for human worship than the penates of ancient Rome.

PEOPLE WILL SOLVE PROBLEM.

Proud of American institutions and of every page of history that records their progress, I have been loth to point to evils that exist. Preferring peace to controversy, I have long delayed public utterance of views frequently expressed to Members of this body. But putting aside personal inclinations and placing public welfare above all else, I have endeavored to present what appear to be facts regarding gross abuse of the presidential appointing power.

I have confidence in the intelligence and honesty and resourcefulness of the American people. They have capacity to judge whether trading of Federal patronage for votes in Congress or in convention is either constitutional or wise. They have the honesty and the courage to make their opinions known, and they have the resourcefulness to find means to express their views. We will leave the subject to the judgment and conscience of the American people, knowing that in their own time and in their own way they will voice their desire and enforce their will.

Mr. CRAWFORD and Mr. SMITH of South Carolina addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I desire to resume the remarks I was making this afternoon when I yielded the floor to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely desire to say that I gave notice on Saturday last that I would address some remarks to the Senate this morning on the question of reciprocity.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. On what?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On the proposed reciprocity agreement with Canada.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, before I make my remarks on this subject I think a few words of explanation from my standpoint are necessary. I do not propose in what I am going to give to the Senate of my views on this question to enter into any of the details. What I desire in my remarks to the Senate, as I have written them, is to give what I conceive to be the proper attitude of each and every one here relative to this subject, and particularly of Democrats, in reference to any measure coming from any source that is moving in the proper direction in so far as we construe the proper attitude of the Government toward the governed. I shall not question the motives of Mr. Taft in attempting to bring about this relation between the United States and Canada. All that I propose to do is to address myself to what I actually find expressed by him. If that expression is in accord with what I believe to be correct Democratic principles and correct rules of government, I shall support it; if it does not go far enough, I will go with him just as far as I believe that it is proper and correct according to Democratic standards for me to go. Because I certainly can fear nothing from a right direction of right forces, no matter whether or not the one who inaugurated them has an ultimately sinister purpose.

Therefore I shall take what the President has transmitted and the reasons he has given therefor as being sincere, coming from the Chief Executive, and for a few minutes I ask the indulgence of the Senate and beg their pardon for reading it. I have tried, however, to boil it down to where the logic of the situation, from the Democratic standpoint, seems to me to be unavoidable and from which there is no escape.

I want each and every one to understand that in the discussion of this question there may be a tendency on the part of some to say that because Canada is so small a part of our great foreign relations, therefore, no matter what arrangements we might make with her, it would not amount to a great deal and might disappoint some. The minutest application of a principle necessarily must be as proper as the greatest application of that principle. My truthful dealing with the child is as essential and necessary as my truthful relation with the adult.

It is hard for me to understand, as a Democrat, how any man who believes in the principles of Democracy can afford to vote against this proposed treaty, for the reason that Democracy stands for the freest possible access to all the markets of the world, both as to buying and to selling, with the simple limitation of enough duty on importation, plus other sources of revenue, to supply the needs of the Government. A tax for any other purpose, from the standpoint of a Democrat, becomes a tax for a special privilege, obnoxious to the very fundamental doctrine that we profess.

It is no argument worthy of a Democrat to say that because for so many years the Republicans have committed the Government to a doctrine of protection that, therefore, so long as one article is protected all others should be likewise protected.

From a Republican standpoint this would be, and is, a consistent argument. But from a Democratic standpoint it is totally untenable.

In the practical application of this argument, as brought about by this proposed treaty, only two sides of the question seem to be considered—the producer of the raw material and the producer of the manufactured article.

There seems to be a tendency to totally ignore that great class who do not own the farm or ranch to produce the raw material, or the factories to produce the finished product—that vast army of wage earners who are consumers. These seem, and are, left out of the count. And, according to the contention of those who oppose this treaty, they are the ones—this great class—upon whom it is sought to impose the entire burden of this tax.

It is argued that it is unjust and unfair to the cattle raiser to bring him in competition with the cattle raisers of Canada, while the man who butchers the cattle—the great slaughterhouse and packinghouse king—is protected in the sale of his meat; that it is unjust and unfair to bring the wheat growers of America into competition with the wheat growers of the Dominion and protect the manufacturer of flour.

And when I use the word "Canada" I mean the principle applied to every wheat-growing country on the globe. And so on through the whole list of field and ranch and factory. Is it not true that if the raiser of cattle is protected equally with the one that produces the meat, that the consumer of that meat must inevitably pay a double tax? Is it not true that the consumer of flour, if the wheat grower is protected equally with the manufacturer of that flour, must pay a double tax on the bread he eats? Is it not true that if a tax is put upon rough lumber equal to the tax placed upon the planed and manufactured article, that the consumer of lumber, the home builder, and those who consume it in our domestic relations must pay a double tax?

Therefore the correct position of the true Democrat is not to contend that so long as the manufactured article is protected the raw material shall be protected likewise, but that, in addition to an open market for the raw material, there shall be an open market for the manufactured product as well. And that, though the Government is committed to the doctrine of protection, and though it has iniquitously discriminated in favor of the manufacturer as against the raw material and the vast army of consumers of the finished article, we, as Democrats, can not afford to say that the raw material shall also be protected until such time as the manufactured article is unprotected. In a word, we can not afford to assume the attitude that while the "good stealing is going on we are entitled to our share." The test—the real test—of one's loyalty to a principle is one's willingness to make a sacrifice for that principle. If I, the producer of the raw material, contend that I be protected in what I produce because the manufacturer is protected in what he produces out of what I produce, I am simply giving up the principle for which I contend.

The proper attitude for me to assume, as a Democrat, toward this principle of government is to stand fast to my doctrine; to insist that no unjust law shall burden the people for my benefit, and that I, the producer of the raw material, am willing, in attestation of my loyalty to this principle, to see that it goes without protection, even at a loss to myself, while, in justice to all, I fight for a reduction, or, rather, a removal of all protection for protection's sake on the manufactured article—standing to my doctrine, yielding not one jot or tittle, and insisting that if the other man does injustice that I be not placed in his class.

It is almost a parallel case to say that because I happen to be in a community, or amongst a class of men where lying and cheating are permitted and the profits of business depend upon lying and cheating, that I myself must lie and cheat until such time as I can get public opinion educated to where they will stop it or a law that will forbid it. What time would I bring it about if I practiced that which I condemn in others? If in my heart of hearts I believe that it is destructive to moral character and manhood to lie and cheat, I will neither lie nor cheat, though I lose every dollar I own. If I believe that the principle of protection is wrong, I will not vote for protection to protect me, even though the other man profits by protection at my expense.

Hancock said that protection was a local issue. That is, that as long as it profited a section at the expense of another section or other people to advocate and to put into operation the law of protection, that that community would be protectionists. But where a community could not profit by it, but suffered for the profit of another, they were antiprotectionists and that, therefore, it was a local issue, involving no principle. According to this theory, there is no principle in the world, in fact. They could all be reduced to local issues. According to his doctrine, if it was profitable in Washington to be honest and truthful, I would advocate and practice honor and truth in Washington. If, in Baltimore, it was unprofitable, I would be dishonest and untruthful there. In a word, in this great theory of government, according to him, there was no real principle involved; no sense of equity, justice, and right. But simply what is profitable to me or my community in dollars and cents, regardless of how this profit comes.

Every real advance of the human family has been based upon an unswerving conviction as to principle, and a loyal adherence to that principle at any cost and any sacrifice. And this is as true of parties as individuals.

It is interesting to note how some men will grow eloquent in their plea that men shall be honest with themselves, stand by their conviction of what is right, pleading for each and every one to stand by his principles of honor and integrity, regardless of whether they stand alone or go with the mass. They boast of their delight in standing by their principles in other matters affecting their individual character and their personal or individual relation to others, and yet these same men will discard this loyalty to principle, this loyalty to conviction, in reference to governmental affairs, as to what is right and proper and advocate that because the other man is doing wrong and profiting out of me by so doing that I must retaliate by doing wrong also and profiting out of him.

I feel like congratulating the President for coming to a Democratic viewpoint.

A great writer has said, "A false principle wrought into real life will always work itself out in disaster," and the present condition of the Republican Party stands as a startling illustration of that truth. The doctrine of protection, as taught and developed by them, has resulted in the practical disruption, temporarily at least, and from all indications permanently as well, of the Republican Party. It is instructive to the people at large to compare what the President says in his message accompanying the proposed treaty, in reference to the tariff, and what the leaders of his party said during the debates on the tariff in the last Congress. He says:

> We have reached a stage in our own development that calls for a statesmanlike and broad view of our future economic status and its requirements. We have drawn upon our natural resources in such a way as to invite attention to their necessary limit. This has properly aroused our effort to conserve them, to avoid their waste, and to restrict their use to our necessities. We have so increased in population and in our consumption of food products and the other necessities of life, hitherto supplied largely from our own country, that unless we materially increase our production we can see before us a change in our economic position from that of a country selling to the world food and natural products of the farm and forest to one consuming and importing them. * * * Ought we not, then, to arrange a commercial agreement with Canada, if we can, by which we shall have direct access to her great supply of natural products without an obstructing or prohibitory tariff?

The high cost of living and the very necessities of the case, and over and above all the result of the November election, have caused the head of the Republican Party to see sufficient light to begin, even in the minute corner of the Northwest, to deal fairly with the people on these great questions.

The contention of the Democratic Party has always been, in reference to farm products, that the tariff did not and could not materially benefit them, for the reason that the surplus fixes the price, as sold in the foreign markets, for the domestic market.

There has been a delusion amongst the farmers who produce the raw material. There has been held out to them the false promise, the empty promise, that if they would vote for protection it would mean the protection of their product as well, while even last year, with the greatest of home consumption of American wheat and the least exportation of the same, we exported 92,000,000 bushels.

During the tariff debate of last year there was an investigation as to the cost of living. According to the report of the majority the tariff was exonerated from any part in this burdensome increase.

I happened to be a member of that committee. The wholesaler, retailer—the numerous class of middlemen—who distributed these articles of necessity were the ones guilty of burdening the American people with this extraordinary cost of living. Now, therefore, when the President proposes an agreement with another country, lowering the tariff on some and removing it entirely on other articles, there is a cry to the effect that if this be done, the producers of these articles in this country stand face to face with bankruptcy for the benefit of those who eat the food.

So long as the investigation had no power to enforce a law, such as is proposed in this treaty, it seemed to be a problem as to what was the real cause. Mr. Taft, in one proposition, has uncovered to the American people the real cause in half the time and at infinitely less expense than all of the investigation of the committee on the cost of living.

What is this reciprocity that he proposes? He has put cattle, horses, hogs, sheep, poultry, alive and dead; cereals of all kinds, hay, fruits, and vegetables on the free list, together with a lot of other articles, amongst them wood pulp and rough lumber. The primary and secondary stages of all food products have in the first instance been put on the free list, and in the second instance the duty has been lowered materially.

As to the percentage of reduction on manufactured articles, fresh meats have been lowered 16 per cent; bacon and hams, 67 per cent; meats of all kinds, dried and smoked, 66 per cent; flour, 60 per cent. In a word, throughout the whole list secondary articles have been materially reduced, so that the Canadian markets, in all the articles specified, are open to a greater American trade, while the American markets have likewise been open to Canadian trade, guaranteeing a greater market for such things as we can produce more cheaply than Canada and a greater market in America for such things as Canada can produce more cheaply than we. Embodying the very principles for which the Democratic Party has always stood, this question of reciprocity may not have gone far enough, but as far as it has gone it certainly has gone in the direction of Democratic doctrine.

Some of the opponents of this measure were those who clamored for free lumber, because they happened to be in those States where there was a scarcity of lumber, and which States were nearer to Canada than they were to those States in the United States where there was an abundance of lumber.

To-day, when the circumstances are changed, these very men are clamoring for protected wheat against free wheat, yet when free lumber promised to benefit them they wanted free lumber, but when free wheat promises to injure them they want protected wheat. They were perfectly willing to give the people of the United States free lumber if in so doing they could benefit themselves, regardless of whether it benefited or injured the balance of the country. But they are not willing to give free wheat if by so doing the balance of the country will be benefited.

One of the leading Republican Senators, during the tariff debate of last session, declared that the duty on California lemons was high enough or perhaps too high, and stated, as his reason for this seeming Republican inconsistency, that New York could import lemons cheaper from elsewhere than they could from California.

I can not understand the attitude of some of the so-called insurgents on this question. During the discussion on the Payne-Aldrich bill there were no more stalwart champions of a reduction of the tariff downward than they. The cotton schedule, the woolen schedule, the iron and steel schedule, the meat trust, all these were attacked with a comprehensiveness and vigor that endeared them mightily to Democratic hearts. And profound was their seeming disgust when at last the bill was passed and the President affixed his signature thereto. But now that the President seems to have seen the error of his way and has discovered one of the factors at least of the high cost of living, and is honestly endeavoring to relieve the condition as far as he may, these champions of a tariff reduction seem loath to follow their own Republican President when he, partially at least, accedes to their strenuous clamor of a year ago. For what reason, they doubtless will explain in the course of this debate. Let us hope that it is not because most of the articles affected are produced in their States.

We have no right to denounce the selfish, heartless, greedy trusts and combinations of wealth in this country because they have practically monopolized some of the great necessities of life and distressed the people by putting an unjust price upon these articles if we, the representatives of the people, clamor for a protection for those things which we or our localities are interested in. We have no right to denounce in another that which we are practicing ourselves. If, because of the scarcity of lumber in America, because I own lumber or my community owns lumber, I become a party to exacting from the balance of America a price far beyond that which they could obtain in the open markets of the world, I have simply placed myself in the same category with the much denounced and despised protected trusts and combines, for the principle is identically the same. The man who clamors for a protection on wheat because it will benefit his community and the wheat growers in his section, at the expense of the balance of the American people, when the American people could buy this wheat at a cheaper rate if allowed the open markets of the world, is putting himself in identically the same category with the so-called iniquitous trusts and combinations.

When I demand that the article in which I and my community are interested shall be protected because the article that we produce or manufacture can be purchased cheaper elsewhere, I have arrayed myself under the same flag under which the Oil Trust, Beef Trust, Steel Trust, and all the other protected combinations that are fleecing the people are fighting

In conclusion, Mr. President, I wish to say that President Taft, in his proposed treaty with Canada, has challenged the pluck of every Democrat, of every insurgent Republican, of every party or individual who have stood for a lowering of duties, of the widening of the market, who believe in equal rights to all and special privileges to none under the law. And I for one shall vote for and uphold this measure, imperfect though it may be, as a step in the right direction, which, taken advantage of and followed up, may ultimately lead to the liberation of the oppressed.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution submitted by Mr. BEVERIDGE January 9, 1911:

Resolved, That WILLIAM LORIMER was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a second to the demand?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President I desire to be heard——

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair a sufficient number have seconded the demand, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. OWEN. Before that was put by the Chair recognition was demanded of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HALE (at 10 o'clock p. m.). I make the privileged motion that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state his point of order.

Mr. STONE. I wish it to appear in the RECORD that the Chair can not put the question on ordering the yeas and nays when Senators are addressing the Chair.

Mr. PENROSE and others. Regular order!

Mr. BAILEY. In reply to that I want to say to the Senator from Missouri that by demanding the yeas and nays I had no purpose to prevent him or any other Senator from addressing the Senate, but I was recognized and made a privileged demand. The matter is still open for debate.

Mr. STONE. I understand, and I had no thought of this immediate question before the Senate, but this same thing has been done on one or two previous rather noted occasions. I think it is an abuse of the power and right of the Chair. I wish to make a point of order.

Mr. PENROSE and others. Regular order!

Mr. HALE. I insist on my motion.

Mr. BAILEY. The yeas and nays have been ordered, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair understands, and he has so ruled.

Mr. BAILEY. The yeas and nays on the pending resolution have been ordered.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HALE. I do not understand that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENROSE. They have been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have been ordered on the pending resolution. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Maine. The Senator from South Dakota asks the Senator from Maine if he will yield.

Mr. HALE. I will not yield for any further debate.

Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PENROSE, and others. Regular order!

Mr. OWEN. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield until the opinion of the Senate may be taken upon the ruling of the Chair, from which I appeal.

Mr. BAILEY. There is no decision of the Chair. I demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAILEY. The Chair asked if the demand was seconded, and enough Senators seconded the demand to order the yeas and nays. Now, Senators who did not want to order the yeas and nays might have called for the other side, but they did not, and there is no question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota rises to a parliamentary inquiry. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do I understand that the ordering of the yeas and nays shuts off absolutely further discussion on the resolution?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to address the Senate on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the Senator from Maine has moved that the Senate adjourn, and that motion is not debatable.

Mr. STONE. There is a question of order pending. The Chair had no right, under the parliamentary usage of the Senate and its rules, to take the question on ordering the yeas and nays when a Senator is addressing the Chair before the question was put.

Mr. OWEN. That was the point I raised.

Mr. STONE. There is a question on the right of the Chair to do that, and if the Chair overrules the point of order I desire to appeal from it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. STONE. Then I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HALE. Pending that——

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; let us dispose of this.

Mr. HALE. Evidently, nothing further can be done; but I leave it to the Senate. I move that the Senate now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is the motion of the Senator from Maine that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I made a point of order which the Chair overruled. My point of order was that the Chair could not determine the question and submit the ordering of the yeas and nays when the Chair was being addressed.

Mr. STONE. Before it was submitted.

Mr. OWEN. The Chair was addressed before the question was submitted to the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. That question is not debatable, and consequently no Senator could address the Chair on ordering the yeas and nays. But if the Senate desires to settle it I hope the Chair will submit the appeal taken by the Senator from Missouri from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the appeal, of course. The Chair recognized the Senator from Texas, who demanded the yeas and nays. The Chair asked if there was a second, and, in the opinion of the Chair, there was, and the Chair declared that the yeas and nays were ordered. The Chair could not recognize Senators at that time, as he had recognized the Senator from Texas. The Chair understands now that the Senator from Missouri appeals from the ruling of the Chair. On that the question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I desire the parliamentary question of order to be submitted formally to the Senate, so that everyone may clearly understand what the point of order is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands the question, it is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. OWEN. What is the ruling of the Chair on the parliamentary point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling of the Chair was that the yeas and nays had been ordered. The Chair understood the Senator from Missouri to claim that the Chair could not declare that the yeas and nays were ordered, although the required number had asked for them.

Mr. OWEN. The point was that the Chair submitted to the Senate the question on the yeas and nays when the Chair was being addressed and before it was submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overruled that point of order.

Mr. STONE. The point, Mr. President, I raised is not that the Chair had wrongly decided that a sufficient number had seconded the demand for the yeas and nays, but that when the Senator from Texas was recognized and demanded the yeas and nays, before the Chair submitted it both the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from South Dakota rose and addressed the Chair, and the Chair refused to recognize them, and persisted in submitting the question of ordering the yeas and nays to the Senate, and decided, so far as that goes, very properly, that the yeas and nays had been ordered. The Senator from Texas says the question on ordering the yeas and nays is not debatable. That is true, but the yeas and nays can not be properly ordered, nor a vote taken, nor any step of that kind undertaken until the debate itself has been terminated.

Mr. PENROSE. This debate is out of order, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. I do not know whether it is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri rose to a question of order.

Mr. STONE. It is not out of order. I should like to have the Senator from Pennsylvania furnish any authority upon which he states that this is out of order.

Mr. PENROSE. I call the attention of the Senator to Rule XX, page 20, of the Manual:

> And every appeal therefrom shall be decided at once and without debate.

That is, an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. STONE. But the question of order is unquestionably debatable. Still I have no wish to protract the debate or consume the time of the Senate. I want to say to the Senate, however, that this is a bad precedent for us to establish by a deliberate vote of the Senate, for it may be a black chicken that will come home to roost on some other occasion.

Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PENROSE, and others. Regular order!

Mr. STONE. I am proceeding in the regular order. If the Senator from New Hampshire does not think so, then his suggestion is proper. Otherwise, it is exceedingly improper. If the Senator desires to say anything, he had better rise and address the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will answer the Senator by saying that if he will read Rule XX he will find that an appeal is not debatable; and if the Chair will enforce that rule the Senator will not take any longer time on this question.

Mr. STONE. I am through, anyhow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri that if he had risen to a question of order and so stated he would have been recognized by the Chair. He did not rise to a question of order. The Chair was putting the demand of the Senator from Texas, and during that he could not recognize anybody else. The Chair understands that the Senator from Missouri appeals from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. STONE. I did rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator did not state it.

Mr. STONE. How could the Chair know for what purpose I rose unless the Chair recognized me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator did not state that he rose to a question of order.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I rose to address myself to the question of order, and the Chair did not recognize me, but insisted upon putting the demand for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator now rise to that question?

Mr. BAILEY. But one question of order can be entertained at one time, I submit to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. OWEN. On that I ask for a division.

There were, on a division—ayes 45, noes 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The decision of the Chair is sustained by the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On what question?

Mr. OWEN. On the question just announced by the Chair that the decision of the Chair is sustained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the Senator from Oklahoma demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the demand of the Senator from Oklahoma for the yeas and nays upon the decision of the Chair standing as the judgment of the Senate. Is there a second?

Mr. STONE. Pending that, I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the demand for the yeas and nays, the Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate now adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a second for the demand for the yeas and nays made by the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has already stated the question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I beg the Chair's pardon, but I was called out of the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has demanded the yeas and nays on sustaining the ruling of the Chair upon the question of order raised by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. A parliamentary inquiry. What did the Chair rule?

Mr. KEAN. If the Senator had been here, he would have heard it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state for the information of the Senator from Indiana that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] demanded that the question on the pending resolution be taken by yeas and nays, whereupon the Senator from Missouri rose. The Chair asked if there was a second to the demand of the Senator from Texas, and, in the opinion of the Chair, there was a second to the demand. The Senator from Missouri appealed from the ruling of the Chair, and stated that he should have been recognized, as the Chair understands.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would prefer not to be interrupted during the statement of his understanding of the parliamentary situation.

Mr. OWEN. I should be delighted to have the Chair conclude.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has demanded the yeas and nays upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair, which was lost on a rising vote.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. On what point did the Senator from Missouri rise to address the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri rose and addressed the Chair and made a point of order. The Chair overruled the point of order, and the Senator from Missouri appealed from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What was the Senator's point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order was that he ought to have been recognized when the Chair was putting the demand of the Senator from Texas for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think it is very clear.

Mr. PENROSE and others. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays, demanded by the Senator from Oklahoma. Is there a second to the demand?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. PENROSE. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized for that purpose.

Mr. CRAWFORD resumed his speech. After having spoken, with interruptions, for 2 hours and 20 minutes,

Mr. OWEN. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Oh, my good friend——

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. The Senator from Oklahoma rises to a question of order. The Senator will state it.

Mr. OWEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. CRAWFORD. My time is being wasted recklessly, because it is going to take me some time to conclude my argument.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator said it would not take him more than 15 minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I did; and I said it in good faith.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Crawford	Heyburn	Rayner
Bailey	Culberson	Johnston	Richardson
Bankhead	Cullom	Jones	Root
Beveridge	Cummins	Kean	Scott
Bourne	Curtis	La Follette	Shively
Bradley	Davis	Lorimer	Simmons
Brandegee	Depew	McCumber	Smith, Md.
Briggs	Dick	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Dillingham	Nixon	Smith, S. C.
Brown	Dixon	Oliver	Smoot
Bulkeley	du Pont	Overman	Stephenson
Burnham	Fletcher	Owen	Stone
Burrows	Flint	Page	Swanson
Carter	Foster	Paynter	Thornton
Chamberlain	Gallinger	Penrose	Warner
Clapp	Gamble	Percy	Watson
Clark, Wyo.	Gronna	Perkins	Wetmore
Crane	Guggenheim	Piles	Young

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-two Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. CRAWFORD resumed his speech. After having spoken about half an hour he yielded to Mr. OWEN.

Mr. OWEN. I raise the point of order that there is no quorum.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. I was just going to suggest that no business has intervened since the last call.

Mr. OWEN. I call attention to the precedents in this case. In a similar case the Senate has heretofore held, as will be found in Gilfrey's Precedents, that discussion comprises business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has repeatedly held that discussion is not business, but the present occupant of the chair, regardless of that rule, at any time when a reasonable length of time has been consumed in discussion and it was reasonably apparent that a quorum was not present, should entertain the demand for a roll call. But where, as in the present case, a roll call has twice been demanded within the last 40 minutes and each time upward of 70 Senators have answered to their names, there having been no intermediate business save discussion, the Chair sustains the point of order made—that a Senator can not raise the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I call attention of the Chair to the empty seats, now obvious, which show plainly there is no quorum present.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I suggest that the Senator withdraw his suggestion of the absence of a quorum for the present, in view of the fact that the Chair has held that if a reasonable time has elapsed, in the opinion of the Chair, a Senator has his rights under the rules, and that until the Chair thinks a reasonable time has elapsed, no point of this kind be made. If at that time the same point is made, of course there will be discussion upon that ruling. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded, which is the speech of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. BACON. I want to make a remark upon the point of order. I am unwilling that the ruling of the Chair, which he has just made as to the question of the right to call for a quorum, shall pass with the apparent acquiescence of the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It did not.

Mr. BACON. I shall not now at this late hour of the night endeavor to appeal from the ruling of the Chair, but I am unwilling for it to pass without an expression of my dissent. I do not think that there is anything in the rules of the Senate or in the general principles of parliamentary law which will sustain the ruling, with all deference to the Chair. Of course the Chair will not misunderstand me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly not.

Mr. BACON. I make the suggestion simply with the view that whenever the question comes up hereafter it will not appear to have been made with the acquiescence of the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I may be mistaken, but I am under the impression that many times in the House and also in the Senate this precise question has arisen, though on a different motion. My impression is that where motions to adjourn were repeated the Speaker of the House has held over and over again that mere discussion was not intervening business. I have sent for the Precedents of the House. If I am mistaken about that, I was mistaken about the point of order; but I think it will be found that without distinction of politics the Speakers of the House have held that it was not competent to repeat motions to adjourn with nothing but discussion intervening between them. If I am not mistaken, one of the most distinguished Speakers which the State of Georgia ever furnished to the House of Representatives during my membership of that body held that precise question.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not wish in any manner to take issue with the learned Senator as to what may have been done in the other House. I simply wish to remark that the methods in the House are altogether and fundamentally different from the methods in the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true, but on the particular question as to whether discussion is intervening business or not, I take it the rule would be the same in both bodies.

Mr. BACON. No; Mr. President, not the same, for the fundamental reason that the House proceeds upon the assumption of the presiding officer to exercise a discretion which is not allowed to a presiding officer in this body. The distinguished Senator from Texas himself said a few weeks ago that the Presiding Officer of the Senate occupies a very different relation to this body from that which the presiding officer of the House occupies to that body. The presiding officer of the House is a Member of the House; he is elected by the House; he is the representative of the dominant party of the House, whereas in the Senate it is altogether different.

The Presiding Officer of this body is not a Member of this body; he is not elected by this body; he is not the representative of this body; he is not responsible to this body. This body controls itself and is not to be controlled by its Presiding Officer, except so far as he is called upon to administer the rules of this body.

There is a vast distinction between the two. In the one case the presiding officer of the House is a Member of that body, chosen by that body, responsible to that body, and the representative of the dominant party in that body is clothed with power to exercise a discretion as to whether or not he will recognize a Member, whether or not he will entertain a motion, because if he decides wrong it is always within the discretion and power of that body, if necessary, to depose him from his office. That is not the case here. This Senate is a self-governing body, and the only power that the Presiding Officer has is to administer the rules of this body. He has no other.

Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to proceed, I desire to state again—with all deference to the Presiding Officer and with no disposition to criticize in any way, but simply to express an honest difference of opinion in this matter—the ruling of the Chair necessarily assumes to the Chair the exercise of a discretion to determine when the matter shall have progressed to a stage where the Presiding Officer will recognize it as intervening business, recognizing that in some instances it will be intervening and in other instances not intervening business. I respectfully submit that the Presiding Officer of the Senate has no such power, because he is not a Member of this body, he is not responsible to this body, and he can not, in case he rules wrongly, be called to account by this body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair call to the attention of the Senator from Georgia a ruling made in the Fifty-fourth Congress, and may the Chair read it?

Mr. Hill raised a question of order, viz, that when the presence of a quorum was determined by the last roll call a Senator can not immediately thereafter suggest the absence of a quorum, no business having intervened; and

The Presiding Officer (Mr. BACON) sustained the point of order.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. I am entirely familiar with that case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the last Congress it was repeatedly held by the Chair, and the Chair was repeatedly sustained by the Senate, that debate was not intervening business.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I may be permitted to rejoin to the precedent cited by the Chair at the time I had the honor to occupy it, that it does not correspond with the question which is now before the Senate. I recollect the occasion distinctly. I then had the honor to be in the chair when the then Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Quay, called for a quorum, and the roll was called. Immediately thereafter, not after debate, but before there had been any debate, he called again for a roll call on the ground that there was no quorum. There had been literally nothing done. It is not a case, Mr. President, where it had been ruled that the roll having been called and debate having proceeded with, when the roll was again called that was not intervening business. It was a case where the roll was called and a quorum disclosed by a call of the roll, and immediately thereafter the Senator from Pennsylvania again demanded a roll call, alleging that there was no quorum present. I think the then occupant of the chair, who happened to be my own unimportant self, correctly ruled, there having been no debate, no question, no proceeding of any kind, that there had been no intervening business. If the occasion was one in which there had been debate, and the occupant of the chair at that time had ruled that there had been no intervening business, and for that reason no roll could have been called, I would certainly stand confounded by my own decision at that time; but that was not the case.

I want to submit to the Chair this proposition: If you will leave out of question for the present the exercise of discretion by the Chair, it amounts to this: That a Senator can take the floor and he can announce to his party, "I am going to speak for the next five hours, and you all can go off and go to bed and go to sleep; there can be no call for a quorum during that time, because I will not yield the floor, and the fact that there has been no business, except debate, will be recognized as a conclusion that there has been no intervening business, and consequently no roll can be called. On the contrary, our opponents will have to stay here, because they do not know what minute I may stop or what minute I may demand a vote. Therefore you can take your ease. I can hold my political opponents here indefinitely; they can not call and bring you back, but they can not leave, because I have got the floor and they do not dare to leave while I have it." Of course, Mr. President, that is a reductio ad absurdum. The only alternative to that is that the Presiding Officer of this body shall exercise a discretion to determine when a sufficient amount of debate has been had to justify his decision that it is an intervention of other business.

Mr. SCOTT. Regular order!

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is just what the Chair assumed to do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. This is the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the speech of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply want to say, in reply to the statement of the Senator from Georgia, that I recently called attention to the fact that the Presiding Officer of this body was not chosen by it, but the Senator omits to say that I made that statement merely for the purpose of insisting that the Presiding Officer must administer the rules of the Senate in the light of the precedents of the Senate.

I did not mean to say then, and I would not say now, that the circumstance that the Vice President of the United States is made by the Constitution the presiding officer of the Senate takes from him the power to construe the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I know, Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Or the power to enforce those rules according to general parliamentary law. That is the whole of the suggestion. I repeat, though I repeat it with no great degree of confidence, but I repeat that my impression is that the Speakers of the House of Representatives have for many years held that a motion to adjourn could not be repeated as discussion proceeds, because they have held that debate is not intervening business. I may be mistaken about that, but if I am, then I misunderstand the Precedents. I do not think I do.

Mr. BACON. The Senator can not state it more strongly than I would do.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask for the regular order. We are staying here——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia demands the regular order.

Mr. SCOTT. To hear the Senator from South Dakota. I want him to go on with his speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the speech of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment, until the Chair gets through making the statement. The Senator from South Dakota has the floor. He can continue, but he can not yield to another in the face of an objection, and a demand for the regular order is an objection. So the Senator from South Dakota must proceed or yield the floor.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am perfectly willing to proceed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator rise to a point of order?

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise to ask the Senator from South Dakota to yield to me for a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] has demanded the regular order, which precludes the Senator from South Dakota yielding, the Chair regrets to say.

Mr. SCOTT. I object. I demand the regular order.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of reading——

Mr. SCOTT. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas can not do that in the face of the objection of the Senator from West Virginia. The only thing in order is the speech of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CULBERSON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has made no decision.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Chair has ruled that there was no intervening business, although half an hour had elapsed since the previous roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was half an hour ago.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Nothing has occurred since——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was half an hour ago, and the Senator from South Dakota has proceeded since.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has four times counted those present in the Senate during this discussion, and 46 is the least number of Senators who have been present here at any time during this discussion.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. SCOTT. I demand the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Four times——

Mr. BACON. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Indiana, not as a matter of right, but the Chair will recognize the Senator from Indiana to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The parliamentary inquiry is this: Does the Chair assume the right to count a quorum? The Chair has just stated——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under certain circumstances the Chair does; under existing circumstances the Chair does.

Mr. SCOTT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I appeal from that ruling.

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I make the point of order, Mr. President, that there is no quorum present, and that the Chair is in error in attempting to count a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At the present time the Chair will order the Secretary to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Clark, Wyo.	Johnston	Shively
Bailey	Crane	Jones	Simmons
Beveridge	Crawford	Kean	Smith, Md.
Borah	Culberson	La Follette	Smith, Mich.
Bourne	Cummins	Lorimer	Smith, S. C.
Bradley	Davis	McCumber	Smoot
Brandegee	Depew	Martin	Stephenson
Briggs	Dick	Nixon	Stone
Bristow	Dillingham	Oliver	Swanson
Brown	Dixon	Owen	Thornton
Bulkeley	du Pont	Page	Warner
Burkett	Fletcher	Paynter	Warren
Burnham	Foster	Penrose	Watson
Burrows	Gallinger	Percy	Wetmore
Burton	Gamble	Perkins	Young
Carter	Gronna	Piles
Chamberlain	Guggenheim	Root
Clapp	Heyburn	Scott

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names, and a quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have examined the Precedents as well as I could in a hurry, and I find that I was mistaken as to what the Speaker of the House held on the question of intervening business, within the meaning of the rules. I do not find the later decisions which I thought I would find, but I find as early as 1834 the Speaker of the House held debate was intervening business.

I make acknowledgment of my mistake, and I desire to have that acknowledgment appear in the RECORD.

Mr. CRAWFORD resumed his speech. After having spoken for 25 minutes,

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. CULBERSON. In order to keep the matter along systematically I desire to read the first paragraph from the Precedents on the page from which the Chair read a few moments ago.

The bill (H. R. 174) repealing the duty on tea and coffee being under consideration, a call of the Senate was had, followed by a motion to adjourn, which was not agreed to. Without debate, another motion to adjourn was made, which the Presiding Officer [Mr. Ferry of Michigan] ruled out of order, "no business having intervened."

Discussion having taken place, a third motion to adjourn was made, to which an objection was made. The Presiding Officer [Mr. Ferry of Michigan] said "there was discussion that intervened, and therefore business of the Senate." (See Cong. Globe, p. 2627.)

I want to insert this in the RECORD in connection with what was said by the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that all that took place in the Forty-second Congress, and the ruling to which the Chair referred took place in the Fifty-fourth Congress and subsequently in the Sixtieth Congress; the Senate twice voted that debate was not intervening business, once upon the direct question submitted by Vice President Fairbanks and, second, upon a motion made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to lay an appeal on the table.

Mr. CULBERSON. Upon all of which protests were entered.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Which later was reversed.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Chair to-night read only the ruling made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is quite right. That is all the Chair read.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Georgia explained that by showing that the demand for a roll call was immediately after a roll call had disclosed the presence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not want to prolong the discussion of this most important matter at this late hour. I rose only in view of what the senior Senator from Texas has just said to us, to say that when this matter comes up at a more convenient time, if it should be insisted by anyone that a quorum may not be suggested, intervening debate having taken place, a question will be raised in the opinion of Senators on both sides of the Chamber quite as important as the pending question itself, at which time there will be a presentation of the precedents and authorities. Familiar as the Senator from New Hampshire is with the ruling made at the time the emergency currency bill was pending and about to pass, that ruling, as the Senator from Texas has well said, was made under protest, and was, as the records will show, not adhered to at later sessions.

That is all I desire to say at this juncture.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me a moment?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply want to add in this connection—and I thank the Senator from South Dakota for permitting me the privilege at this time—it occurs to me it would be a very unfortunate thing if we broadly decide that debate is business, because a Senator holding the floor can utter one sentence, a point of order can be made that there is not a quorum present, the Senator can utter another sentence and a point of order again and again be made. So I think we ought to guard that matter very carefully, and not upon the broad proposition that debate is business, absolutely put the Senate in an attitude where it could not possibly transact the public business. So we could destroy the Government if we agreed to that proposition.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator to discuss this question, which is, I repeat, a question as important as the pending one, more than to say now that it will be very fully discussed, and to answer the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The Senator suggested what all Senators here know, and especially the Senators on the other side know to be the fact, that this rule once established means possible cloture in this body. The question will be fully presented as to whether we are going to change the constitution of the United States Senate, our rules of procedure; whether we are going to end the practice of a century and a quarter and begin by a series of rules to adopt cloture in this body.

I myself am a Republican and I am from the North; but, as I have stated before in more than one debate in this Senate as against the position of some of my own party, I myself got my first convictions upon this subject from the exhaustive learning and unanswerable arguments of my predecessor in this body—Senator Turpie. I regard it as a question of fundamental importance, and as was stated, and I think the Senator from New Hampshire concurred in that statement about a year and a half ago, rules had been made under the heat of circumstances which, if adhered to, would mean absolute cloture in this body. But this will be gone into quite fully.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. JONES. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll, 40 minutes having elapsed since the last roll call.

The Secretary called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Crane	Heyburn	Shively
Bailey	Crawford	Johnston	Simmons
Beveridge	Culberson	Jones	Smith, Md.
Bourne	Curtis	Kean	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	Davis	Lorimer	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Dick	Martin	Smoot
Briggs	Dillingham	Nixon	Stephenson
Brown	Dixon	Oliver	Stone
Bulkeley	du Pont	Overman	Swanson
Burkett	Fletcher	Page	Taylor
Burnham	Flint	Paynter	Thornton
Burrows	Foster	Penrose	Warner
Carter	Gallinger	Percy	Warren
Chamberlain	Gamble	Perkins	Watson
Clapp	Gronna	Piles	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Guggenheim	Root	Young

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. BACON. I want to ask the Senator if he will not yield to me in order that I may take a moment of the time of the Senate as to this matter.

I want to say, Mr. President, that I do think, with all deference to the gentlemen who disagree with me on this subject, that a question of the right of a Senator to a seat in this body ought to be discussed fully, and ought to be determined with the utmost candor and care; that it ought to be treated with a dignity that far surpasses any requirement of dignity in any other matter this body can be called on to consider.

I want to ask if Senators, after reserving enough time to fully discuss this question, will not now agree on some day and some hour upon which we may take a vote upon the question whether the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] is entitled to a seat in this body. I do think that every consideration of the dignity and the high character of this body and the high character of the question invokes at our hands a proceeding altogether different in its character from any other proceeding I can imagine requiring the consideration of this body. I appeal to Senators to fix a date, whenever they wish; I appeal to them to let us wrangle about other matters, but upon the great question whether a Senator has a right to a seat on this floor let us treat it differently from what we would other matters of contention and let us fix a time when this vote may be taken.

I do not suggest the time myself; I am willing for any time to be adopted that will give the fullest opportunity for every Senator who desires to do so to express himself upon this subject. I say to the Senate very frankly, I will not discuss this question. This is the first time my voice has been raised in the Senate upon this subject. I have, however, made a very careful study of it; I have come to a conclusion in regard to the matter which I am ready to express by my vote. I have no doubt that every other Senator has done the same thing. It does seem to me that we ought to put aside all other considerations, in view of the high character of the question that is involved and the great responsibility which rests upon us. I invoke Senators to the putting aside of all other considerations whatever and coming to a conclusion in regard to this matter. I will fix any date that Senators may suggest as the most remote date which may be needed. We have other matters to contend about; let us contend about other matters; but this is too big a question, too solemn a question, too far-reaching a question, and one too influential in its results, so far as it may affect the future, for us to trifle with it in any way or deal with it in any way except in the most solemn of all our capacities—the capacity of judges. This is not an ordinary question.

Mr. President, I repeat, this is the first time my voice has been raised on the Lorimer case, and whatever may be my judgment as to the vote I shall cast, whatever may be the judgment of any other Senator, I do think the time has come when we should put aside everything else except a recognition of our obligation in the most solemn of all matters, to discharge one of the highest of all obligations. I will ask now if the Senators will agree that we shall take a vote, say, at any hour on Friday next?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, with the same obligation that the Senator from Georgia expresses, I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, at the time the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] began his address this afternoon, when I gave way to him, I had commenced to make some comment upon some phases of the testimony taken by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I was referring to a statement made by a partner or quasi partner of Charles A. White. It seems that at one time White was engaged at O'Fallon, Ill., in a sort of real estate and insurance business, and he had a partner there named John W. Dennis. Mr. Dennis was in a position to know something about Mr. White's movements and something about Mr. White's financial condition. Mr. Dennis was called as a witness in this case, and he testified that on about the 15th day of June White, who did not have a dollar on earth according to his testimony, left O'Fallon, Ill., and went to Chicago.

Mr. Dennis says that Mr. White was gone for a day or two and then returned to his home at O'Fallon; that he saw him the next day after his return in his office; that Mr. White had there the sum of $200 in money—currency—he saw it lying on the table and saw him handling the bills—bills of large denomination. That testimony in itself indicates this much: That Mr. White went to Chicago without money and came home with money. Mr. White says that during his visit to Chicago he met Mr. Browne in the Briggs House, and Mr. Browne admits that he met him there; Mr. Browne admits that he gave White some money there, but claims that it was a mere loan, and only a small amount. Mr. Dennis can not be charged with having the slightest interest in the result of this investigation. It does not appear that it makes the slightest difference to him whether Mr. LORIMER remains as a Member of this body or goes out of it. No possible motive has been shown on his part to tell anything except the truth about this matter, which was one of simple observation on his part. No attempt was made to discredit Mr. Dennis; no attempt was made to show that his testimony was in any particular contradictory or unworthy of belief. Not the slightest attempt was made anywhere to show that he is not a reputable citizen, a credible witness in every respect; and he brings his story here under oath and it is put in the record in this case. The fact is that this dissolute man, without a dollar in the world, left his home and went to Chicago; the admission of Browne is that he met him there; that they had some transaction with each other, and that he returned with a considerable sum of money.

I was commenting on the fact, just before I gave up the floor this afternoon, that Mr. White, upon his return from Chicago, went over to a department store in his town late in the afternoon, apparently too late to get into the bank. He knew one of the employees there, Mr. Hollander, as I recollect, and he asked Mr. Hollander if he would not make some arrangement by which he might leave some money he had in his office with the cashier of that department store during the night. Mr. Hollander went to the cashier of the store, Mr. Kirkpatrick, and made the request of Mr. White known to Mr. Kirkpatrick, and brought Mr. White to Mr. Kirkpatrick. Kirkpatrick took an envelope and handed it to Mr. White, who took it, counted out a large amount of money, folded it up, put it into the envelope, sealed it up, wrote the amount of money, $800, on the outside of the envelope, wrote his name on the envelope, and handed it to Mr. Kirkpatrick, who put it into the vault of that department store and kept it over night; that the next morning, along about half past 8 or 9 o'clock, Mr. White called and got his envelope and this money. Mr. Kirkpatrick or Mr. Hollander—I do not recollect at this moment which, but one or the other of them—was called as a witness, put under oath, submitted to examination and cross-examination, and he stated these facts. Nobody has ever attempted in the slightest degree to discredit this witness. There is not a thing in the record to indicate that he is not a perfectly trustworthy reputable citizen of O'Fallon, Ill. Not one thing indicates that his story was not credible and worthy of belief. He could not have the slightest interest in the event of this inquiry. It could mean nothing on earth to him personally. No motive on his part to tell a falsehood or commit perjury has any foundation whatever, and it would be the most unreasonable thing in the world for anyone to conclude that this statement of the employee in the department store of O'Fallon, Ill., is untrue.

So you have Mr. Dennis, of O'Fallon, Ill., an acquaintance of Mr. White, one acquainted with his financial situation, one knowing of his movements, giving testimony that he left O'Fallon on a certain day, went to Chicago, and returned with an unusual sum of money in his possession. You have this testimony of the employee in this department store giving in detail the facts with reference to his having $800 in money and leaving it in that department store. Are Senators to say that this testimony is to be brushed aside; that it is unworthy of any consideration whatever; that it is not entitled to any belief? Upon what ground? Upon what theory? What foundation is there for such a claim as that?

But it does not stop there. Miss Vandeveer, a stenographer, a young lady living at O'Fallon, Ill., had done stenographic work for this man White in his insurance business and in his real-estate business. He was owing this young lady for her services some $50 or more. I think he paid her some $50.50, and he owed her considerably more than that.

After he returned from Chicago upon this occasion—when he went there at the invitation of Mr. Browne, Mr. Browne admitting that he had an interview with him in the Briggs House—when he returned from Chicago to O'Fallon, Miss Vandeveer, his stenographer, says that he called her into his office the next day and there, at his request, they made out a list of his indebtedness to different people in O'Fallon; they made out a list of creditors to whom he was indebted there in that neighborhood; that then they were called in one after another and he made settlements with these creditors of his; that she assisted in the transaction; that they conversed together about it; that she compromised her indebtedness with him, which was something like $80, as I recall, and accepted fifty dollars and some cents, and gave him a receipt for the money. She says the money lay on the table, that it was a rather unusual sum for White to have, that she noticed the large denominations of the bills, and that it was yellow-backed money—gold certificates and bills of that character. This girl noticed that. She assisted in making up this list; she assisted in the transaction of paying these different creditors of Mr. White; and she went on the stand and gave her testimony to that effect.

I want to ask Senators if there is any reason why the testimony of this girl should not be accepted as testimony worthy of belief—as credible testimony—a most straightforward story told in a natural manner, and so natural in detail that one could not but be impressed by its truthfulness? Why should it be brushed aside? Why should it be disregarded? Why should it be considered as unworthy of any weight as testimony in this case? There is no basis on earth for indulging in any such presumption as that or for drawing any such conclusion as that.

A stenographer, performing the simple services of a stenographer in an office, perhaps working in several other offices performing such service, and witnessing this business transaction, was called by the committee, put under oath, and gave this testimony in that simple, straightforward manner, and was corroborated.

Mr. President, as to the evidence of Mr. White having received money from Mr. Browne on the 16th day of June, after the adjournment of the legislature at Springfield, I have been showing corroborative testimony from a disinterested source and of a disinterested character, because a very savage attack has been made upon Mr. White's statement as coming from a man so degraded that it was unworthy of belief. I am calling attention to testimony that can not be attacked upon grounds of that kind; and I have instanced here the testimony of a former partner of his, Mr. Dennis, of O'Fallon, Ill., a disinterested witness, against whose character not one single charge has been made and against whose testimony not one single inconsistency or contradictory feature has been designated. I have also called attention to the testimony of Mr. Hollander, an employee in a store at O'Fallon, Ill., where Mr. White upon his return from Chicago deposited $800 in cash; and not one single charge against the character of Mr. Hollander or against his testimony has been presented here.

I have also called attention to the testimony of Miss Mollie Vandeveer, the stenographer, who was in Mr. White's office when he counted out the money and made payments to his creditors the next morning after he returned from Chicago. Not one single charge of inconsistency or of contradiction is laid against the testimony of the stenographer, Mollie Vandeveer; not a breath of suspicion against her credibility as a witness has been brought. There you have three—Hollander, in the store, who saw the $800 in cash; Dennis, the former partner, who knew of the visit to Chicago and saw the money in White's possession on his return; and Mollie Vandeveer, the stenographer, who saw it on the office desk and saw him making these payments with it.

And you have something more than that. You have in the record the bills themselves of Mr. White's creditors, at O'Fallon, Ill., with whom he made settlement that next day after his return from Chicago. You have those bills receipted by these creditors and put in the record in this case. Do you want better corroborative testimony than that? If the fact of White having money in his possession after his return from Chicago is not established by that testimony, disinterested, positive, direct, and simple, then you can not prove a fact.

A man can be hanged on the gallows, and would be by the verdict of 12 disinterested jurymen upon testimony as conclusive as that; and how can Senators undertake to say there is no testimony corroborating the statement of Mr. White that he met Mr. Browne in Chicago on the 16th day of June and received this money from him at the hotel in Chicago, the Briggs House, when, under date of June 16, 1909, the date when White says he met Browne there and had this transaction with him? Upon the hotel register in the Briggs House in Chicago is the name of Lee O'Neil Browne, made at that time.

Little circumstances like that are the strongest kind of testimony. The straws for which no particular individual can be responsible, but which are the necessary incidents to all human transactions, are the strongest kind of testimony, stronger by far than mere oral testimony; and there is the name on the hotel register of the Brigg House in Chicago, on June 16, at the time when White says he met Lee O'Neil Browne and got this money from him; there is the signature of Lee O'Neil Browne upon the hotel register. Pretty good testimony; pretty strong corroborative testimony. They fit together like links in a chain. They fit together like pieces of dovetail. John W. Dennis, at O'Fallon, White's partner, saying he went to Chicago on the 15th. He returned on the 17th or the 18th, and he had this money when he came back and did not have it when he went; the admission of Browne that he met him in Chicago on the 16th, Browne's name on the register on that day; the testimony of Hollander, in the department store, that Browne on his return came into the store after banking hours and left $800 in cash; the testimony of Mollie Vandeveer that she helped him to make out a list of the creditors and the amounts and assisted him in paying these bills; the receipted bills themselves—do you want any better corroborative testimony than that?

No one has attempted to overthrow a single one of these corroborative collateral facts. Now, I say that it establishes the fact that Mr. White went over to Chicago a few days after the legislature adjourned, met Browne there, and came back with money which he could have received from no one but Browne. Nothing to indicate that he saw anyone there but Browne, nothing to show that he had any transactions with anybody else there save Browne. Corroborated by all these disinterested witnesses, and you can draw but one conclusion, my fellow Senators, and that is that for some reason or other he met Browne there, and Browne gave him this money.

What did he give it to him for? Has anybody ever offered any explanation except the one that is testified to positively in this record? The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] in his statement the other day made no reference to anything of this kind. He left it severely alone. Can you leave it severely alone? Upon what theory? It is corroborated by disinterested witnesses, by record testimony made at the time. There is no escape from it.

So here is one man who got money, got in over in Chicago from Lee O'Neil Browne on the 16th day of June, 1909, after this legislature adjourned. He got $900. He had received $100 down in Springfield before he left there. I have called attention to this one instance to show that the testimony of the receiving of money has the strongest sort of corroboration from disinterested witnesses, from disinterested sources.

Now, we take one of the others. Take Beckemeyer. Beckemeyer was in St. Louis, he says himself, on the 21st day of June, 1909, and on the 15th day of July, 1909. He says that on the 21st day of June, 1909, he went there at the request of Lee O'Neil Browne, from whom he had received a communication of some sort, either by letter or by telegram, requesting him to come, and that he went. He met Lee O'Neil Browne at the Southern Hotel in St. Louis; that he received from Mr. Browne there $1,000, which Mr. Browne told him was Lorimer money; that afterwards, on the 15th of July, he was requested to go there again, and that he went, and there he met at the same hotel Robert E. Wilson, a Democrat from Chicago, who had voted for Mr. LORIMER, and that Robert E. Wilson paid him in cash $900.

You can say: What is the corroboration of that? The record is full of it, and it is that sort of corroboration that is absolutely convincing. For instance, Mr. Beckemeyer went over to the Commercial Trust Co. in St. Louis upon the very day that he met one of these men in St. Louis to deposit $500 in cash. He had to be identified and he called a man with whom he was acquainted, James Gray, who knew the officers of the bank, to go with him and identify him to the officers of the bank. This man was called as a witness. Was he an interested witness? Not at all. Any charge laid against him as being unworthy of belief? None whatever. Any claim that his testimony is improbable and inconsistent and unworthy of belief? None at all. Not a single claim of that kind is made; and this man testifies that he went in and introduced Mr. Beckemeyer to the officers of this bank; saw him count out this money; saw a hundred-dollar bill in the roll; saw him put it in the bank.

Now, that is a circumstance to corroborate Mr. Beckemeyer, who says that on that very day he met Browne or he met Wilson, whichever one he met that particular day, at the Southern Hotel, and he paid him this money, and he had it on his person, and he wanted to do something with it, and he got this friend to identify him over at the Commercial Trust Co., and he made a deposit of this considerable sum there. Is not that corroborative testimony? If not, I do not know what corroborative testimony is. It is a circumstance that fits into and supports and sustains the testimony of Beckemeyer himself.

Beckemeyer testifies that he met Browne in St. Louis upon the 21st day of June, and there upon the register of the Southern Hotel, in St. Louis, under date of June 21, we find the name of Lee O'Neil Browne. Is that corroborative testimony? Certainly it is corroborative testimony and proves conclusively that Lee O'Neil Browne was in St. Louis, was at the Southern Hotel, had engaged a room at the Southern Hotel, just as Becke-meyer stated he had been there that day, had been at this hotel, had a room in it, and met him in that room; and no concerted arrangement between Beckemeyer and the clerk of the hotel could be presumed by which through some sort of concert they were manufacturing testimony of this kind. Such a conclusion as that would be perfectly wild and ridiculous; and yet here are two independent facts established from two independent sources—the testimony of Mr. Beckemeyer that he met Lee O'Neil Browne on the 21st day of June at the Southern Hotel in St. Louis in his room in that hotel, and the hotel register of the Southern Hotel, under that very date, showing that Lee O'Neil Browne was there; that he had engaged a room there.

Strange coincidence if this is manufactured testimony, a wonderful guess on the part of Beckemeyer if he was making up a false story and happened to guess a day when the register of this hotel showed that Browne was there. That is nonsense, the wildest sort of nonsense. That is the wildest kind of fancy—to undertake to get away from facts that have been established as these have been established by asserting that this is not credible testimony.

He said he went back on the 21st day of July, and at this same hotel he met Robert E. Wilson, and that Robert E. Wilson paid him $900; and when you consult the hotel register of the Southern Hotel at St. Louis under date of July 21, you find there the name of Robert E. Wilson, of Chicago, Ill., and that he had been assigned a room that day at that hotel.

Do you call this manufactured testimony? Do you say that is not worthy of belief; that this man Beckemeyer is manufacturing a story; and yet he fixes upon a day when he met Robert E. Wilson at the Southern Hotel in St. Louis, and the clerk of the hotel produces the register of the hotel and there upon that very date is the name of Robert E. Wilson, assigned a room?

What are you going to do with corroborative proof of that kind? How are you going to get away from it? Try to snuff it out, wipe it out, ignore it by saying it is not worthy of belief? Does the register at the Southern Hotel at St. Louis commit perjury also? Is the register at the Southern Hotel in St. Louis committing perjury, and is it a confessed criminal that you will not believe? Utterly ridiculous! You can not get away from it.

That is not all. Mr. Beckemeyer says that when he met Lee O'Neil Browne at the Southern Hotel in St. Louis on the 21st day of June he also met there in Mr. Browne's room in that hotel Mr. Link, Mr. Luke, Mr. Clark, Mr. Shephard, all of whom were members of the legislature, all of whom were Democrats, all of whom had been in Springfield during the session which closed only a few weeks before at which Mr. LORIMER was elected United States Senator. Is he corroborated in that? Just mark that. He says that on that day in the Southern Hotel he met Mr. Browne and he also met these other members of the legislature—Shephard, Clark, Luke, Link—that they were all there.

Is that corroborated? Yes; it is corroborated by these very men themselves. Browne admits it except that he says his recollection is that Clark was there. But Clark was the only one who says he was not there, and Browne says that since Joe says he was not there it may be that he was mistaken. But Link says Clark was there; Shephard says Clark was there; Beckemeyer says Clark was there; and Browne says he thinks Clark was there; that it is his recollection that Clark was there. Do you want any better corroborative testimony? Each of these men not only admits that he was there himself, all with the exception of Clark, but admits that he saw these others there. If that is not corroborative testimony, then I do not know what corroborative testimony is. It fits together, dovetail fashion. It fits together like the links in a chain.

You are not dependent upon Beckemeyer's statement alone, because you have to support the statement of Browne, the statement of Link, the statement of Shephard, and these other witnesses, and you have the hotel register to go along with the rest. That is pretty good testimony. Men have been hung many times on weaker testimony than that. I would not be afraid to submit that testimony to any 12 honest, fair-minded jurors in any part of the United States, and with absolute confidence I would expect a verdict at their hands that these men were, to say the least, all together in this hotel in St. Louis on this date.

A strange circumstance; a strange incident, unless you find its proper place as a part of the transactions which precede it at Springfield, Ill.

Exactly the same thing is shown with reference to the next meeting, the one at this same hotel in St. Louis on July 15; only at the meeting of July 15 White was there. White was not there at the first meeting, the meeting on the 21st of June; and when you get the history of the facts you see why White was not there. It was not necessary for White to be there. He had met Mr. Browne over at the Briggs House, in Chicago, on the 16th day of June, and he had received his swag—his $1,000 had been paid to him there and at Springfield—and so, when they had the meeting in St. Louis on the 21st day of June it was not necessary for White to be there, and he was not there. They did not even notify him of that meeting, and he did not go; but everyone of the others went, because they had not been paid.

But on the 15th day of July here is a meeting over in St. Louis at which Browne was not present; but Robert E. Wilson, who had been in the legislature and who was one of the Democrats who had voted for Mr. LORIMER, was there in his place; and at that meeting here comes Beckemeyer, here comes Clark, here comes Luke, here comes Link, here comes this whole bunch who had been there and had met Browne there on the 21st day of June. Only the 15th day of July afterwards here they all come back and meet Wilson at this same hotel, and there one after another gets $900 in cash. Link admits that he got $900 in cash; Beckemeyer admits that he got $900 in cash; White admits that he got $900 in cash; Shephard says that he did not, but that statement of Shephard is the only statement as to that fact which is a very improbable one, because Shephard is not able to give any satisfactory reason or explanation of his being there. He can not do it; he can not explain why he was there. He tried to fix up a story as to how he came to be there. He discovered out at his garage that he did not have packing for his auto; that he happened to discover, and it took him over to St. Louis to get new packing just at this time, so that his arrival there would be most timely and would bring him into St. Louis at the very time his confederates arrived there.

It is an invented story indeed, because this man who went over to get some packing for his automobile immediately gravitates over to the Southern Hotel. Immediately after he gets to the Southern Hotel he finds his way up into the room where Lee O'Neil Browne is meeting these other men, or where Robert E. Wilson is meeting these other men. He goes up there, meets these confederates, and is interviewed by Robert E. Wilson in the same bathroom into which Mr. White had been invited, and in which he had been paid, according to his own statement, $900 in cash. He goes into the same bathroom into which on the same day Mr. Link had been invited and in which he had been paid $900 in cash. He goes into the same room into which Mr. Beckemeyer had been invited and in which he had been paid $900 in cash. Mr. Shephard says that he was asked by Mr. Wilson to go into that same bathroom. There was something about that bathroom that seemed to make it a very desirable place in the middle of the day in which these men were not to go there alone, but to be accompanied always by Robert E. Wilson. I do not know in just what condition they could have been, but it was necessary for Robert to go with them.

When Mr. Shephard is asked to explain why he went in there he says, "I am a bachelor, you know, and when I was at Springfield, while the legislature was in session, I had a lady dine with me one day, and when I got up into Mr. Wilson's room in the Southern Hotel, Mr. Wilson took me into the bathroom, and there closed the door, and then in the profound secrecy of that wonderful place he asked me who the lady was that took dinner with me in Springfield." [Laughter.] What do you think of that? Senators who are so incredulous about the statement of these other witnesses, where it is corroborated, as the testimony of White is corroborated by Miss Vandeveer, by John W. Dennis, by Mr. Hollander, who saw the cash when he returned from Chicago, how quickly and readily you believe the statement of Mr. Shephard, that all that was said when they got into that bathroom up there in the Southern Hotel after Mr. Wilson closed the door was that Mr. Wilson asked Mr. Shephard who the lady was he had at dinner with him down at Springfield.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota whether this record discloses who the mysterious lady was?

Mr. CRAWFORD. He says it was his sister-in-law.

Now, is that an explanation as to why on a certain day in St. Louis Mr. Shephard, who dropped in there and met these old pals of his at Springfield, with whom he had associated the winter before—incidentally dropped in to see his friend Wilson and have this little exchange of pleasantries, with a confidence about the lady who took dinner with him—happened to be in St.

Louis that day? Ah, that will not do. That is, to use common parlance, entirely too "gauzy."

Mr. Beckemeyer says that when Mr. Wilson was paying him he had a $500 bill, and he says, "I was told to give this to Shephard." Oh, no! what a significant remark for Mr. Wilson to make when he was paying off these other men in the bathroom and had a $500 bill there—"I was told to give this to Shephard." Shephard was a banker. How did this man Wilson come to make such a remark as that? Do you mean to tell me that was a pure invention of H. J. Beckemeyer? Upon what ground—upon what theory—has anyone the right to say that this statement which Mr. Beckemeyer says Mr. Wilson made in the bathroom when he paid him and showed that he had a $500 bill there, "I was told to pay this to Shephard," is mere fiction and to believe Shephard? It is an utterly improbable story that he met this man in the bathroom to have a little talk about his sister-in-law having taken dinner with him down at Springfield months before. Ah, that will not do. Reasonable men will never be satisfied with any such explanation as that.

Then let me tell you something else. This man Shephard is a banker. This man Shephard had a safety vault over in the Commercial Trust Building in St. Louis, and that very day when he was in St. Louis he went to that Commercial Trust Bank and he visited his safety vault. What for, do you suppose? He did not want to take that $500 bill that he had just received from Wilson and put it in an open account. He is a pretty shrewd little fellow, a pretty canny bachelor. Although he could hardly expect reasonable people to accept this story about the conversation in the bathroom relating to his sister-in-law, he did not want to take the $500 bill that he had just received from Wilson and put it in the bank and he visited the Commercial Trust Co. where he had a safety vault. Is that corroborative testimony?

Take the story of these witnesses, each telling his own story in his own way, and mark them all down as the blackest scoundrels on the face of the earth, and yet their testimony dovetails together, not in language, but in the events to which each independently refers, and is corroboratetd by testimony which none of them created, but which exists over and beyond their control.

Mr. President, I have now been giving some of the corroborating testimony that establishes conclusively the fact that there were two meetings of these men who are under the charges put upon them by this record of having corruptly bartered away their votes, and showing the improbability of any claim that they did not hold these two meetings at St. Louis and there receive corrupt money. I am not through with that branch of the case. The corroborative testimony is overwhelming.

Mr. President, when men are conscious of the fact that they are guilty, suspicious of the fact that some one is on their trail, criminals generally act in about the same way—that is, they make fools of themselves. These men in that respect were not exceptions at all. What I mean by that is tnat when they discovered that White had betrayed them, that White and a detective were looking them up. their conduct is not that of innocent men, but their conduct is that of guilty men. Why? Immediately this man Beckemeyer hurries from his home down to Centralia and meets Joe Clark there. They hustle over to Springfield, and they meet Robert Wilson there. They rush back up to Chicago, and they meet Wilson, they meet Holstlaw, they meet "Manny" Abrahams, and they meet their attorneys. Then they go to manufacturing testimony, and they jump from the frying pan into the fire; they get into the mire deeper and deeper, as men are very apt to do who are guilty. An innocent man is never driven to any such expedient as that; an innocent man, conscious of his innocence, is not impelled by fear to do these ridiculous things.

Beckemeyer was over in "Manny" Abrahams's saloon; he had a saloon keeper from his town along with him; and he says, "I don't know where I am at, now that this story of White's is coming out. We have been away on a fishing trip, and we are going again. Don't tell anybody where we are. I don't know where I am at, now that this story of White's is coming out." Is that the talk of an innocent man? Is not that the conduct of a guilty man? They talk about the meeting at St. Louis. First, they decided that they would deny that they had been in St. Louis at all.

They did just as guilty men, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, will do. They will resort to lying, deception, and perjury to cover up their tracks. They had these hurried meetings. I can almost see them fleeing, trying to get away from the eyes of men that they knew were fixed upon them, to escape from themselves, and to get away from their guilty consciences. You see them fleeing from Chicago down to southern Illinois, and back to Chicago again, saying: "We don't know where we are since this story of White's has come out. We are going fishing somewhere; don't tell anybody where we are. We don't know where we are." Is that a guilty man or is that an innocent man?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, we are all interested in the Senator's description of the fleeing of these innocent gentlemen with their guilty consciences. May I suggest to the Senator that probably they were not fleeing from a guilty conscience, which at no time appears to have troubled them, but from the Nemesis justice. They were fleeing from the wrath to come and were arranging alibis to protect them when that day arrived. As to any guilty consciences, I do not think they had any consciences.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator is right about that. I think I am called upon to withdraw the statement where I used the term "guilty consciences," because the Senator is certainly right. There is no evidence here of a guilty conscience or of any other kind of conscience. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is true.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But they acted like guilty men. Beckemeyer hastened down to see Joe Clark. Joe Clark was the most hardened old criminal in this gang. I think if you want to find a real thoroughgoing, unadulterated, thick-hided, up-to-date criminal, you may find him in one of these lazy, good for nothing police-court magistrates, or policeman in some little country town. Joe Clark was the one to whom Beckemeyer hastened in his flight. Beckemeyer wanted to know if Joe thought it would be all right to absolutely deny that they were in St. Louis at all, and Joe thought that it would be. He had an interview with Link, and suggested to Link that it would be a good thing to absolutely deny that they had been down there at all. Before they met this ingenious police magistrate, however, who advised this short-cut way of protecting themselves by perjury, they tried to fix up another way of explaining how they came to be in St. Louis.

There were two explanations for these two trips to St. Louis. There was one explanation for the first trip, when they met Mr. Browne at the Southern Hotel. Then there was another explanation for the second trip to St. Louis, when they met Mr. Wilson. Explanation first was this: They claimed that the rendezvous where the politicians of southern Illinois met for consultation was at St. Louis. Lee O'Neil Browne was the minority leader, and it was necessary for him to have conferences with his associaties from southern Illinois. Therefore he appointed this first meeting on the 21st day of June, at which he was to meet his leading political associates from southern Illinois at the Southern Hotel for a conference. Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne says that he went there to talk matters over, to have a political visit, to have a social visit, and to spend several days with his companions looking over that great city, which he had only been in once or twice before in his life.

I want to call the attention of Senators to the fact that the only political leaders whom Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne met at the Southern Hotel at St. Louis on the 21st day of June were the particular individuals with whom he had just been associated in the legislature of Illinois many months, and that legislature had adjourned only about a fortnight before this. They had been together all winter and all spring at Springfield, in daily communication there all this time, had just left and gone to their several homes, and yet Lee found it necessary to call a conference for consultation at the Southern Hotel in St. Louis to talk over the political situation; and the only men invited were the particular individuals with whom he had had some very suspicious transactions at Springfield only a few weeks before.

There are some very, very remarkable things about this political meeting at St. Louis. Lee O'Neil Browne went there for a political interview and to spend several pleasant days looking over the city and indulging in a social visit with these old friends of his. He got there in the morning; he registered at the hotel, and his name is on the register. He got his room, and before evening the business was all done, and he took the train and went back to Chicago. There is not a word in the testimony to show that politics was ever mentioned in any conversation between them, but he talked with Link, I think, about some pacing horses.

The only men he met there were not county committeemen nor State committeemen nor postmasters nor local politicians of the community, except as they were all represented and embodied in the persons of the gentlemen with whom he had had some very suspicious transactions at Springfield only a few weeks before. He went there to have a political conference, and a strange political conference it was, because he got his room at the Southern Hotel, and these men dropped in and out. They stayed a marvelously short time when they got in his room, but they got the "ready necessary," and then they skipped. And it is very apparent that when they got that, the errand for which they had visited St. Louis was at an end, and each went his way and, like the Arab and his tent, disappeared after this little transaction was settled. It did not take a very extended conversation between them to settle it. It was not necessary to go into any embarrassing details at all. They understood each other perfectly. Mr. Browne knew why they were there, and they knew very well why they were there, and it took only a short time; in fact, Mr. Browne did not find it necessary to stay all night in St. Louis.

This meeting at St. Louis, which was held there between these men and Mr. Browne, lasted only a few hours, and he met each one of them apparently separate from the others. This room he had engaged he did not find it necessary to occupy even one night. He got there in the morning, he met these men, and had a little business with them, a little quiet business, which took only a short time to transact, and then before night took a train and went back to Chicago. He said it was a political trip. When he was asked what they talked about, he said: "We talked about that about which we talked." That is illuminating. He could not give more details about their conversation than that, except that he discussed pacing horses with Link.

Now, Mr. Browne had a marvelous memory in some ways. He went back to a date prior to the election of the Senator on the 25th of May, and they asked him about what occurred in the evening when it is said that he met Charles S. White in his room, when White claims that Browne told him there would be $1,000 in it—in the Lorimer deal—and about the same amount from other sources. When Mr. Browne was on the stand and was giving his testimony in regard to that matter, he went on and with marvelous accuracy he told all about what occurred in the office of the St. Nicholas Hotel, in Springfield, Ill., on the night of the 25th day of May, 1909. He spoke about the Kansas City hummer coming—the K. C. hummer, he called it—and he told the very hour and the very minute that it was due, if it was on time; but he says that night it was late, did not arrive in Springfield until 11.41; that a certain gentleman from Peoria or somewhere came into the office, and before this gentleman had registered he went to him in the hotel office and asked him to go and speak to another gentleman there and convey some request that he wanted that man to receive through this gentleman; that the man attended to this for him; that he then registered; and he told the order in which his name appeared on the hotel register at the St. Nicholas Hotel, and that Charles S. White did not register until after this man registered. He told about this man being assigned to a room, and how long he remained in the office, and when he disappeared, and that White did not go—could not have gone—to his room until after that.

This was May 25, 1909, and Browne was testifying last October; and yet his memory was so clear and so accurate and so marvelous that he could go back over these intervening months, a year and a quarter or a year and a half, and give the exact minute when the Kansas City hummer arrived in St. Louis; but when he was asked what they talked about when they had this meeting down at the Southern Hotel on the 21st day of June, when he met Clark and Beckemeyer and Luke and Link, he could not remember one single thing that was said except that he talked with Mr. Link about pacing horses.

The explanation that this meeting at the St. Nicholas Hotel between Browne and these men was a political meeting was a cooked-up story. That is self-evident.

What about the next meeting? They tried to fix up an explanation for the meeting on the 15th day of July with Robert E. Wilson. What was that? They arranged that Robert E. Wilson should write a letter and send it through the mail or in some fashion to Browne and Beckemeyer and Link, and in this letter say to them that some of the boys wanted them to get up a banquet in honor of Lee O'Neil Browne, and that they desired that they meet in St. Louis on the 15th day of July to talk the matter over.

This letter was written in fact in 1910, after Charles S. White had given this exposure to the public, after they had discovered that White and a detective were looking into these matters. They were frightened; they were on the run; they were in a panic; and they feared that it would leak out and be proven that they met Wilson in St. Louis and that they got this money. So for the purpose of fortifying each of them against the circumstances that they knew might appear to indicate their guilt, they deliberately agreed among themselves to manufacture this testimony by writing a letter in 1910 and dating it back prior to the 15th day of July, 1909, and putting such a letter in the hands of Mr. Link and Mr. Beckemeyer and others. They intended to use this letter and offer it in evidence as an explanation for their meeting in St. Louis. Beckemeyer confessed to this, produced the letter, and the letter is in evidence.

Oh, what a ridiculous piece of manufactured testimony, and how like the action of guilty men fleeing from their shadows in fear!

Doc. Allison was one of these Democrats who voted for Mr. LORIMER, and here is this letter that they made up among themselves:

CHICAGO, June 26, 1909.

Hon. H. J. C. BECKEMEYER, Carlyle, Ill.

Friend BECKEMEYER: Doc. Allison was speaking to me regarding getting up a banquet for Lee in his home town, Ottawa, and asked that I take matter up with some of the boys. I expect to go to St. Louis in the near future in connection with our submerged-land committee, and will advise you in advance as to when I will be there, and would like for you to meet me. With best wishes, I am,

Very truly, yours,

ROBERT E. WILSON.

Beckemeyer destroyed the envelope in which this letter was sent to him, and because he did not want that envelope to be discovered with the postmark on it. This letter, he says, was written in 1910 and dated back in 1909, and sent to these guilty men simply to be used as fake testimony for the purpose of making it appear that they had an innocent reason for meeting in St. Louis. Lee O'Neil Browne's secretary, Mike Giblin, is the man who upon his typewriting machine wrote this letter. It came from him as the result of an intrigue between Beckemeyer and Link and Lee O'Neil Browne to manufacture in cold blood testimony to be used for the purpose of making it appear that their meeting in St. Louis was an innocent one.

Oh, but the chain of guilty circumstance weaves a web about these men, puts them in meshes from which afterwards there is no possible escape.

Mr. President, after they had manufactured this testimony, and after Beckemeyer and Link were in possession of this fake testimony, they got still more under the influence of panic and fear and they went down to see Joe Clark, and he suggested to them that they deny that they were in St. Louis at all. So when they were haled into court and brought before the grand jury and put under solemn oath, Beckemeyer testified that he was not in St. Louis at all; that he had not been there on either the 15th or the 21st at all; and when Mr. Link was brought before the grand jury and interrogated about these transactions he stated under oath that he was not in St. Louis at all.

Both of them were indicted for perjury; both of them were facing a conviction for perjury, because the evidence that they had been in St. Louis was absolutely overwhelming. So they began to squirm. They began to realize that they were dealing with the majesty of the law itself, that they were facing a charge and a trial from which there was no possible escape. At last persuaded, it is true, by the public prosecutor of Cook County, they decided that the best thing they could possibly do was to frankly confess to the truth, and they made their confession. Then this miserable story of corruption and bribery was laid before the world, and these men under oath confessed that they had been in St. Louis and that on the 21st day of June Mr. Browne had paid each of them $1,000, and on the 15th day of July Mr. Wilson had appeared there in Mr. Browne's stead, because Mr. Browne was sick, and had paid each of them $900. Mr. Beckemeyer stated that Mr. Browne told him when he paid his thousand dollars that it was his Lorimer money, and that when he paid this money he told him, "This is coming to you."

Now, Mr. President, the conduct of these men is so inconsistent with any theory of innocence and so perfectly consistent with the theory of guilt that I confess I have regarded it as the most puzzling problem I have ever failed to explain to myself, how Senators whom I know to be absolutely honest and sincere could come to any other conclusion than that these men were guilty of trafficking in legislation and of selling their votes in the senatorial election at Springfield.

What inducement appears in the record from any source as an explanation for the payment of this money? That the money was paid is so thoroughly well established that there is no escape from it. When we look into the motives of men and undertake to find where the reason lies for these transactions, the logic of the testimony points as unerringly as the needle points to the pole to the senatorial election at Springfield. For instance, take Broderick. Mr. LORIMER himself has helped us a little there because he says that Broderick is his friend; that the friendship reached back to a time so far in the past that he can not remember when it began, and that Broderick's relatives lived over in his district and Broderick had been accustomed to use his influence with those friends to vote for

Mr. LORIMER when he was a candidate for Congress over and over again in the years gone by.

Now, we find Mr. Broderick in the State senate at Springfield. We find Mr. Broderick had been in the legislature in Springfield for a number of years, so that Mr. Broderick knew the peculiar ways they have at Springfield for doing things. Mr. Broderick had been there long enough to make, I dare say, a great many observations in regard to the jack pot, in regard to the purchasing of votes, in regard to the suppression of legislation through the use of money, and in regard to the procuring of the passage of bills in the interest of great companies accomplished through the use of money, because everybody seems to admit that that sort of thing had been going on at Springfield for years. I will not give any names here, because I would not betray a confidence, but a very prominent citizen of that State said to me the other day it was in a way known that for years they had been in the habit of making up a purse, amounting to sometimes a hundred thousand dollars, through different interests and had used it there.

I know nothing about it except this sort of conversation and what appears in this record. But it does appear in this record, and appears to be conceded in this record by both sides, that there had been for years at Springfield what they called a jack pot, a corruption fund used for the purpose of influencing legislation. And I have been amazed to hear men say that this condition of things exists in more than one of the capitals of the States of the Union. I refuse to believe it; it is too appalling to believe that this sort of thing exists at the capitals of different States, and has existed there for years. But it appears to be conceded in this case that it had existed for a number of years at Springfield. Mr. John Broderick, who had been a member of the legislature for a number of years, was one of the men very likely to know of it, and he is the senator who had this transaction with his colleague, Senator Holstlaw.

Do you say there is no testimony here to show that this money was to be used for the purpose of influencing the election of a United States Senator? How can anyone possibly make a claim like that in the face of the testimony we have here? The testimony of Holstlaw can not be brushed aside by saying that Holstlaw is a bad man; that he is a confessed bribe-taker and unworthy of belief, because all the circumstances in the case corroborate him.

Mr. Broderick, according to the statement of Mr. LORIMER himself, was an old friend of his, with whom he had been on terms of the closest intimacy politically for many years, and whose relatives and kinsmen lived in his district. Broderick had been accustomed to lend him assistance over and over again. John Broderick had been in the legislature at Springfield for a number of terms. It was a matter of common knowledge that there was in each legislature a corruption fund. John Broderick evidently knew of this corrupt practice. It does not appear here that John Broderick was personally interested in any particular item of legislation in regard to which there was an inducement to him to make an improper use of money, but it does appear that John Broderick, Democratic senator from Chicago, was very deeply interested in the election of Mr. LORIMER to the United States Senate.

I say that because the statement of Mr. LORIMER himself shows it; I say that because the testimony of John Broderick given in this case shows it; I say that because the testimony of Senator Holstlaw, with whom this transaction was had, shows it. It furnishes a very consistent background and setting when we look into the nature of this transaction between Holstlaw and Broderick.

I have said it did not appear that Broderick was interested in any other transaction. That is not correct when I reflect that the agreement made with Holstlaw in regard to the sale of furniture was coupled, so far as Holstlaw's statement is concerned, with a recital of a conversation he had with Mr. Broderick in relation to his vote for Mr. LORIMER.

Now, I have given you the setting and situation from which to judge the motives and the purposes of these men when we look into this transaction in which the $2,500 was paid.

Mr. Holstlaw was brought to book before the grand jury at Springfield, charged with having made a corrupt agreement as a member of a committee to buy furniture for their capitol building, charged along with his associates, Senator Pemberton and this representative, Joe Clark, with having made a corrupt bargain with a company that wanted to get the furniture contract, that if they gave to them this contract they should receive a commission out of it.

Holstlaw was to receive, according to an agreement between him and Mr. Johnson, I think his name was, the sum of $1,500 if he would enter into this corrupt agreement, and Mr. Johnson, if that is his name, said that that was more than they were paying Clark; that they were going to pay Clark only $1,000. Mr. Holstlaw was brought to book in this furniture deal, and the grand jury over at Springfield indicted him. He was confronted with a most serious situation. He realized that there was nothing between him and the door of the penitentiary; and Mr. Holstlaw realized that there was only one escape, and that was to come out and tell the truth in regard to this whole transaction.

You can not overthrow testimony of that kind by saying that it is not to be accepted because the man who gave it was under indictment, for over and over again in the history of the trial of cases that kind of testimony has been found to be satisfactory to reasonable men and convincing to juries, and verdicts have been rendered upon it when corroborated, as this testimony is corroborated, and others have been convicted and sentenced to long terms in the penitentiary upon just such testimony.

Mr. Holstlaw came out and made a statement. In that statement he said that the night before LORIMER was elected John Broderick—this old friend of Senator LORIMER from Chicago, living in the adjoining district, who had been his faithful political supporter for years—came to him and said: "We are going to elect LORIMER to-morrow. And when Mr. Holstlaw replied to that statement in some form he said, "If you vote for him, there is $2,500 in it for you."

I am glad to have this testimony strengthened by what appeared here in the statement of Mr. LORIMER himself; that Broderick was his old friend and between them there was a political friendship extending back for years; that he had been accustomed to help him politically. This is an additional circumstance which makes the testimony of Holstlaw all the stronger.

The next day after that statement of Broderick's, when the roll was called in the legislature, Mr. Holstlaw, a Democrat, voted for Mr. LORIMER, a Republican. The record shows that. Then, on the very same day—remember this—that Charles S. White met Lee O'Neil Browne at the Briggs House in Chicago, and got his $900 for voting for LORIMER, Mr. Senator Holstlaw comes into Chicago from his home, away down in southern Illinois, goes out on to the West Side, where John Broderick's saloon was located, which he had never visited before in his life, is taken into Senator Broderick's office, and is paid by Senator Broderick the sum of $2,500.

No testimony! Is not that a remarkable thing that on the very same day two transactions between different men occurred in the city of Chicago in relation to the election of Senator LORIMER—$1,000 or $900 being paid by Browne to White and $2,500 being paid by Broderick to Holstlaw?

I was commenting upon the very remarkable fact that upon identically the same day two circumstances occurred in Chicago between two different men acting independently of each other—in the Briggs House between Browne and White, in which Browne gave White $900; in the saloon, over in West Chicago, between Holstlaw and Broderick, in which Broderick paid Holstlaw $2,500. Is not that remarkable? Ah, there is corroboration in this case! These are remarkable circumstances beyond the power of any mind to create. What makes this testimony convincing? How do you explain circumstances like these?

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], in a sort of ironical way, says that I intimated that my remarks would last only 15 minutes when I began, and that here I am talking into the late hours of night. That is true. I no more expected to go into this extended review of the testimony than I did of leaving the city to-night, and I, in perfect good faith, expected to speak briefly in behalf of Gov. Deneen and stop. But we might just as well understand each other here and now, and it will be profitable to both when Senators like the Senator from New Jersey understand that other Senators can not be trampled down here by a relentless determination that no concessions shall be made; that not even a recess until 8 o'clock shall be taken; and that if we should be diverted for 10 seconds, snap judgment will be entered and a roll call ordered.

It was when that sort of thing was resorted to here that I deliberately determined that it was my duty to enlighten Senators on the other side with reference to what the testimony is in this case, because I am afraid they do not know it.

Here was a most remarkable circumstance—on the very same day two independent transactions between different men relating to the election of this Senator occurred in the city of Chicago. How explain it? You say it is not so; that it did not occur. Mr. White says that on that day he got $900—$50 on the first day and $850 on the next—and awhile ago I reviewed at some length the use he made of the money when he got back to O'Fallon. That is corroborative testimony.

What was the consideration for this thousand dollars that Browne paid to White? It does not appear that White voted for some bill that Browne was interested in, for which he was making this payment. There is nothing in the record showing that. There is nothing in the record showing that there was any other transaction for which he was to receive money from Browne, except a general division of what they called the jack pot and his vote for LORIMER.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] the other day appeared not to be satisfied with this because he thought it was incumbent upon the Senate to trace this money which Browne paid to White—to trace it back into the pocket of Mr. LORIMER—or else, apparently from his viewpoint, it was valueless.

The moment you trace one single dollar of it to Mr. LORIMER with reference to one single vote, no matter whether that vote was necessary to give him a majority or not, you connect Mr. LORIMER personally with this transaction, and one tainted vote would defeat him. But if you show a sufficient number of tainted votes to reduce his vote below the number necessary to give him a majority of those present and voting it does not make a particle of difference where the money came from—not a particle. You do not need to trace it. But if it was money from some source, corruptly used, which caused a sufficient number of tainted votes, so that he did not have a majority of those present and voting, you do not have to trace it. And the Senator from New Hampshire need borrow no trouble whatever on that point.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Knowing the Senator's anxiety to conclude his speech, I interrupt him with hesitancy; but I will remind the Senator that a little while ago he said it was a common thing to have a jack pot around the Legislature of Illinois—sometimes a hundred thousand dollars. Now, is the Senator from South Dakota sure that jack-pot money did not circulate among this bunch of perjurers and liars that the Senator is dealing with?

Mr. CRAWFORD. No; I am not sure. I am quite suspicious that it did.

Mr. GALLINGER. But that jack pot the Senator said was to influence legislation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I did not confine it to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator did.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, the Senator is talking about this man White, the man who undertook to blackmail Senator LORIMER. Failing to do that, he sold his yarn to the Chicago Tribune for $3,500, $1,000 down and $2,500 contingent. It may have been that this contingent fee figured somewhat in this money that White had to go off on his junkets with.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Let me call the Senator's attention to a little circumstance right there that will relieve all the trouble he is having about that, and that is this: That the agreement between White and the Chicago Tribune and the payment of the $3,500 did not occur until long after the vote for United States Senator; long after the payment of this money in the Briggs House; long after these trips on Lake Michigan to Benton Harbor; long after these great sprees which Mr. Browne refers to when he uses that poetic expression about the flowers; long after that—nearly a year after that. So it could not have been any money received from the Chicago Tribune.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota further yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is barely possible that that enterprising paper might have made an advance payment when they set out to destroy Senator LORIMER.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Oh, yes. They had some kind of prescience by which, way back when the Legislature of Illinois was voting for United States Senator, they were foreordaining that on a certain day in June, 1900, Broderick should meet Holstlaw in the saloon over in West Chicago and get $2,500 from him, and that down at the Briggs House Browne should pay White $900. The Chicago Tribune, way back there, was putting up this job, with these subsequent details in it, was it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I can not understand the process by which the Senator arrives at that conclusion, but I can only say it is a very strange one, indeed, when we look at the testimony in this case, because here are separate transactions between men who figured in the testimony. Absolutely nowhere during that period are the transactions which this testimony discloses connected even remotely with the Chicago Tribune or any other newspaper.

I say it makes no difference, in fact, where the money came from. If it was jack-pot money, used to procure votes for Mr. LORIMER, and they procured a sufficient number, without which he would not have been elected, it vitiates the election.

Mr. President, when you look for corroborative testimony of the Holstlaw transaction, how are we to get away from the fact which occurred immediately after the payment of the money? Do Senators arbitrarily, by a sort of forced process of mental exercise, undertake to say that Holstlaw did not go, after he had gotten this money over at Broderick's saloon and put it in the State Bank, and that the certificate of deposit issued in due course of business is only a fiction, and that the testimony of this bank clerk, who comes into court and says:

> This man Holstlaw on that day came into our bank. I had the transaction with him, and he put in this bank $2,500 in cash, and I placed it to the credit of his bank at Iuka, and here is the deposit slip.

Do Senators say: "We will brush that all aside; we refuse to believe this cashier or clerk, whatever he is, although there is not a breath of suspicion against him; we will refuse to accept his testimony, although there is not one contradictory thing about it; we will refuse to accept it, because it appears that Gov. Deneen was a stockholder in that bank?"

I can not understand that method of weighing testimony or that method of arriving at a conclusion or that method of ascertaining facts from testimony. I do not understand it. It is absolutely beyond my comprehension, and I do not believe that many people in this country, reading that testimony with nothing more or less than rational intelligence, will come to any conclusion except that it is true.

Well, what was it paid for—this $2,500? He says that it was paid to him for voting for LORIMER. He was a Democrat. He voted for LORIMER. He had his talk about voting for LORIMER with Broderick. Broderick told him there was $2,500 in it for him, and here he appears and gets his $2,500. Broderick, an old friend of years and years standing, interested in the political success of Mr. LORIMER, had this talk with Holstlaw, made him this promise, and afterwards Holstlaw goes to his place of business and gets this money. What are you going to do with this? Brush it aside; refuse to believe it; say it is not true? Why? Because John Broderick denies it? John Broderick denies some of it, and some of it he does not deny, but dodges. Where he fears that he is running some risk if he does not tell the truth he refuses to say anything. When he was on the witness stand and was asked, "Did you write to Senator Holstlaw to come up there the day you said he appeared there?" he declined to answer.

"I decline to answer." Why? If he had written a letter to Senator Holstlaw, and he said he did not write it, that letter might be produced, and he would be in the same position that Link was in and Beckemeyer was in when they said they did not go to St. Louis and were indicted for perjury. He would have been in the same boat. But he was not truthful enough to say, "I wrote him to come," but he said, "I decline to answer."

Senators may get around that by some process of reasoning that I do not understand, but I say when the ordinarily intelligent people of this country read that man's testimony and find that he declined to answer a question of that kind they will say that man is dishonest; that man is not frank; that man is keeping back the truth, and he acts like a guilty man.

Another question:

> Who was in your saloon that day when he came there?—A. I decline to answer.

He declined to answer. He might name some parties and inquiry might be made of them and he could not sustain his statement. At any rate, he was afraid to make the answer, so he says, "I decline to answer."

Now, you have here first a Democrat, Holstlaw, voting for a Republican, LORIMER. You have preceding it a conversation between this man and this old friend of LORIMER, Broderick, in which he says "there is $2,500 in it if you vote for him." After the legislature adjourned you find this man, Holstlaw, coming from away down in southern Illinois up to Chicago and being there the same day that Lee O'Neil Browne meets White over at the Briggs House, and you find him there getting just exactly the amount that he says Broderick told him he should have for voting for LORIMER. Then you have his testimony corroborated by the officer of that bank, who is absolutely a disinterested witness. How are you going to get away from that? Oh, just simply say I will not believe it. Well, I will believe it. I can not see any escape from accepting it with all the circumstances attending it and accepting it as the truth.

Now, I never yet have understood why when this report was made it left out all reference to the statement of these witnesses that they were not in St. Louis which they made before the grand jury. I do not understand why that occurred. While the committee has been criticized, I never have believed that the committee had anything to do with that trick. But it is there, and my theory of it is that whoever furnished the transcript of that testimony to the committee which they put in their report omitted some very significant testimony. Then counsel who were representing Mr. LORIMER undertook to draw an outrageously unfair conclusion, which could not stand for a moment when that testimony is in there, but which might have a plausible basis with that testimony left out. I never have understood why that was done. But there it is. I refer to the attempt to make out that the testimony of these witnesses is not to be believed because it was obtained under duress. On page 11 of the report of the committee they put in this part of the testimony and left out this other part.

On page 6 of the committee's report they have these questions and answers:

Senator BURROWS. State what you said before the grand jury.—A. Well, I answered questions, but I disremember what all the questions he asked me were.

Senator BURROWS. State those you can remember, and your replies.—A. I denied receiving any money for voting for Senator LORIMER.

By Judge HANECY:

Q. Then did you leave the grand jury room?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. After those different questions were asked you?—A. Yes, sir; at that time I did.

Now, in the record of this testimony here is the part that is left out:

Senator BURROWS. State what you said before the grand jury.—A. Well, I answered questions, but I disremember what all the questions he asked me were.

Senator BURROWS. State those you can remember, and your replies.—A. I denied receiving any money for voting for Senator LORIMER.

Senator BURROWS. What else?—A. Denied meeting parties in St. Louis; I didn't remember of meeting them, that is, at that time.

Why was that left out? For what purpose was that left out? It was left out because it was thought that what is left in there would establish a claim that there was an attempt made to compel these witnesses to testify to a falsehood. That is what it was left out for. It was left out because Judge Hanecy, the attorney trying to make the argument, undertook from this garbled testimony to make the claim that the condition placed before Link and Beckemeyer upon which they might escape conviction was not by telling the truth but by testifying falsely.

And so these excerpts were omitted in the committee report by some trick for which I have never in any sense sought to hold the committee responsible, because I know too well that no member of this committee would intentionally omit that part of the testimony; but whoever furnished that excerpt was seeking to furnish just enough to establish a false charge against the State's attorney of Cook County, else why did he not put it all in? That is only one instance of this attempt to deceive Senators.

At the top of page 9 of this report, between the first and second questions, the following question is omitted:

Q. Do you remember the incident of a young lawyer coming there and saying to you and some officer of the State's attorney's office, "What are you holding this man for?"—A. No; the substance I do; I don't remember the exact language.

Then on page 9 they left out this:

Q. He did stay there until that time?—A. Yes, sir.

First the following question:

Q. Now, was he in the room of the same hotel or place here in Chicago when you and Detective O'Keefe were there, when this young lawyer came in and asked O'Keefe: "Why are you holding him in custody?"—A. He certainly was. I remember the conversation, I think; but I paid no attention to it at that time.

Q. Did the detective threaten that if this lawyer did not go out that he would arrest him and take him before the grand jury?—A. It made him rather spunky; I disremember the exact words, but he said something in that line.

Q. He gave him to understand he would have to keep away?—A. Yes, sir.

On page 9 of the committee report, after the following question and answer:

Q. By the same grand jury you had been before?—A. Yes, sir.

The following question and answer, found on page 295 of the record, have been omitted:

Q. Was it for perjury for not telling them you had received money for voting for LORIMER?—A. That I had not met Robert Wilson——

Robert Wilson was the man he had met in St. Louis.

That I had not met Robert Wilson—no money consideration entered at all—but that I had not met Robert Wilson.

Then on page 11 of the report, after the following question and answer:

Q. That was not true?—A. That was not true; no, sir.

They omitted the following:

Q. And that is what the State's attorney wanted you to tell the grand jury, was it not?—A. I presume just two answers. If I would answer when I went before the grand jury. That is all that Mr. Wayman asked me, was those two questions.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. What were they?

Here Judge Hanecy, an attorney for Mr. LORIMER, who appeared to want to suppress the drawing out of this witness that the reason why he was indicted was because he had said to the grand jury he was not at St. Louis, when Mr. Austrian asked the witness this question, said, "I am examining him." He cut the question off; shut it out, saying, "I am examining him."

Senator BURROWS. We will probably get at that.

Then said Judge Hanecy:

Q. Did Mr. Wayman there tell you at that time that he indicted you; that he was going to take you before the criminal court if you did not tell the grand jury what he wanted you to tell?

The manifest purpose of that question is clear: Judge Hanecy wanted to put the words in the mouth of this witness from which he could claim that the State's attorney undertook to make the witness give false testimony, saying, "You must give this as your testimony, or you will go to the penitentiary," because here is his question:

Q. Did Mr. Wayman there tell you at that time that he indicted you, that he was going to take you before the criminal court if you did not tell the grand jury what he wanted you to tell?

What do you think of a bulldozer like that undertaking to compel a witness to testify in a way that he wanted him to testify to make out a certain theory in this case by which he could claim duress?

The committee left that testimony out. The committee did not do it intentionally, I know, but the trickster who furnished this transcript did it designedly, so that as presented by the committee the testimony would give plausible color to this claim that these witnesses were under the influence of duress.

Yet this witness did not answer Judge Hanecy as he wanted him to. This witness said in answer:

I don't quite understand the question.

He did not see what the judge wanted to fish out of him; he did not understand what the judge was driving at. The judge understood it, but the witness did not.

And the committee left that out. That is not in this testimony that is placed under the conclusion of the court that there was duress and that these poor creatures, held in the clutches of a relentless law officer in Chicago, were put in mortal fear of an indictment brought not for the purpose of vindicating the law, but for the purpose of making them the mere tools of the State's attorney, so that he might manufacture, through these tools, testimony upon which to claim that there was duress.

Out upon such a performance as that on the part of Judge Hanecy, or on the part of the stenographer, or attorney, or whoever may be liable for this attempt to mislead the committee into putting into the record these partial excerpts of the testimony for the purpose of leaving a basis by these omissions for making the claim that there was duress!

They tried to put into the mouth of this witness that Mr. Wayman had cooked up a story, and that he must, in order to save his neck with this indictment over him, go before the grand jury and tell the story that Mr. Wayman cooked up. That is what Judge Hanecy is trying to make him say:

Q. Did you tell the grand jury, then, on the questions of Mr. Wayman what Mr. Wayman wanted you to tell?

Senator BURROWS. What did he tell?

Now, that is omitted. Here is still more of it. On page 12 of this committee's report, the testimony which you will find on page 300 in the record here, a part is left out. For instance, after the words "He wouldn't let me answer the question at all," near the bottom of the page, the words which appear on page 300 are omitted, as follows:

Did Mr. Wayman tell you to answer "no" to that question put by the State's attorney and grand jury in Sangamon County?—A. He had a representative, Mr. Reed, the lawyer there at Springfield, that read a great many decisions in relation to incriminating yourself, etc.

Q. Did he send an assistant down there—an assistant attorney—to Sangamon County grand jury with you?—A. Not with me; but there was one there.

Q. He met you there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. To advise you and represent you there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who was he?—A. An attorney by the name of Reed.

Q. F. F. Reed?—A. I don't know his initials, but his name was Reed; from Aurora, I think.

That is omitted, and an attempt is made to leave the impression by putting in only a part of the testimony that there was some sort of jugglery with these jurisdictions in Chicago and Sangamon County, simply playing through the forces of these grand juries upon these men for the purpose of compelling them by duress to give as their testimony a cooked-up story, false, manufactured, for the purpose of fastening guilt upon innocent men. Material testimony omitted.

Here is some more of it left out on the same point:

At that first interrogation the question of Robert Wilson was discussed, but not the Browne $1,000.

Q. All right, then; the one they first interrogated you about when you went before the grand jury, as to whether or not you had met Wilson in St. Louis?—A. I denied it.

This was the basis for the indictment against this man, and he was asked before the grand jury before which he appeared the first time whether he had met Wilson at St. Louis, and he said, "I denied it."

They left that out in giving the testimony here on which they claim there was duress. They also left out this:

Q. Was that true or a falsehood?—A. I guess it was a falsehood.

Ah, it was this that got the witness into trouble and caused the indictment, and he said, "I guess it was a falsehood." We all know it was a falsehood, because Link was in St. Louis. No one can doubt that, and yet he had gone before this grand jury and denied that he was in St. Louis or that he met Wilson there.

A. I guess it was a falsehood; but I didn't remember of meeting him at that time, or didn't know the date.

The committee left this out when they made their report and put in certain testimony to establish the theory of duress. This did not appear in that testimony.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator is making what I think is rather a serious accusation against the committee.

Mr. CRAWFORD. No; not against the committee. I have said over and over again that whoever furnished the transcript left this out. Does the Senator question that?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator just said the committee left it out.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is not quite fair. It was left out in the report of the committee, but I would not make that statement that the committee did it knowingly, and I tried to protect my words against a charge like that. It is not possible that the committee did it, but whoever furnished the transcript, I say to the Senator from New Hampshire, left out the very portions which sustain the indictments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, here is the testimony. Of course the Senator did not expect the committee would put that all into the report.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. The committee reported every word of the testimony, and Senators have it before them to examine for themselves.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not believe that any stenographer or transcriber could have picked out certain portions and omitted them.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Let me ask the Senator from New Hampshire how he satisfies his mind upon the significant fact that here was a most serious charge against the State's attorney of Cook County, a charge that he was using the processes of the court and the machinery of the grand jury to compel witnesses to testify to that which was false, and the committee apparently were led in sincerity to believe that claim and referred to it in the report and then put the testimony in which they considered established that claim, but omitted from that testimony the very testimony given by these men which furnished the basis for their indictment. How does the Senator from New Hampshire explain the omission?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that might happen without any purpose of misleading anybody. The whole testimony is here.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes, but does not the Senator see that upon the face of the report, with only partial testimony, a most unfair thing occurred with reference to the State's attorney of Cook County?

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be so. The committee, of course, were not under any obligations to put a word of that testimony in their report.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. No. They might have reported that the charges were not proven and have left it there, but they did put in some portions of the testimony, and I have no doubt that the committee acted in good faith.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am not gainsaying that——

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I understand.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But if the Senator will permit me, I am saying it is exceedingly unfortunate and it was unfair to the State attorney and it was misleading to Senators to have the very testimony upon which indictments were returned omitted from that part quoted to show that these indictments were wrongfully used for the purpose of compelling witnesses to testify to falsehoods.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may have been an unfortunate omission.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It certainly was.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yet I recur to the fact that here is the testimony, and every word that was uttered is in that volume.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire, with the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire, whether, if the committee put in any of the testimony, it should not have put in all the testimony that gave the story complete instead of that which just gave one side of it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course they ought not to have put in one side of any statement, and I have no idea that was the purpose.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It happened, though, in some manner.

Mr. GALLINGER. There may have been inadvertently an omission of a paragraph, which perhaps justifies the Senator from South Dakota in making the criticism he does. But I can not believe that it was done purposely by anybody.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am frankly and without reservation glad to say that I am absolutely convinced that it was not done in any manner with the knowledge of the committee. But I can not relieve myself from the feeling that through some source and back of the committee there were interested parties who were furnishing the transcript; that some one who had an interest in having that matter appear plausibly here must have omitted from the testimony those very important parts as they were reported in connection with the conclusion. That is all.

What are you going to do with this charge of duress and this claim that they were using this machinery to make this man tell a cooked-up story, a falsehood, for the purpose of doing an injury to innocent men, when he says here, when pressed by the State's attorney:

A. They didn't ask me to lie.

In this claim that there was duress in this testimony submitted, for the purpose of showing that immediately in connection with the committee's finding, this was not presented:

Q. The perjury charge was correct, was it not?—A. Afterwards it proved it was; yes, sir.

Here is the man who had made these false statements admitting this.

Senator FRAZIER. If it were true that you met Wilson in St. Louis and he paid you $900, and that you met Browne and he paid you $1,000, why didn't you tell that when you came up here before the grand jury and before Mr. Wayman? What were you concealing it for?—A. I didn't want to get myself, perhaps, in trouble and my friends in trouble. I didnt know where the money came from. That was the only reason.

He did not know where the money came from. I insist it makes no difference where the money came from if money was corruptly used and by its corrupt use enough votes were procured for Mr. LORIMER without which votes he would not have been elected; it makes no difference where the money came from, the corrupt use of the money and the resulting election from the corrupt use of the money corrupting enough of them. He was afraid he would get his friends into trouble.

Q. Why didn't you tell it if it were a fact that you got it, and that you met those gentlemen? What were you trying to conceal it for?—A. I didn't know anything what there was about it, and didn't desire to criminate myself for taking this money. I didn't know where it came from.

This question of duress, I think, is an exceedingly important question, because it is the thing upon which those rely who undertake to get around the testimony of these witnesses and make the claim that it is unworthy and should not be considered.

Now, this man Link was asked if it were a present to him, this money, and a fair and honest transaction for campaign purposes or a gift.

Mr. President, Mr. Link was interrogated with reference to the matter of coercion, and I shall call attention to that particular part of his testimony in which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER] asked him, speaking of this money that had been paid to him in St. Louis:

Q. If it were a present to you, and a fair and honest transaction for campaign purposes, or a gift or otherwise, why were you trying to conceal it?—A. I had no reason at all for concealing it.

Q. Why didn't you tell it?—A. Pardon me, I will correct that. I was afraid of getting somebody into trouble; I didn't know where this money came from.

Q. Who were you afraid of getting into trouble?—A. Friends of mine or myself.

Q. Who were your friends?—A. I had a great many friends on the Republican side and on the Democratic side in the general assembly.

Ah, there he connects the receiving of this money with his friends in the general assembly on both sides, Republicans and Democrats. Why did Mr. Link think that if he stated openly and frankly to the public the fact that he had met Mr. Browne and Mr. Wilson in St. Louis and received this money from them he might get a number of friends of his in the legislature, members of the general assembly, both Republicans and Democrats, into trouble? Can you answer that question? Can Senators answer that question without inferring that the reason he was afraid was that it would get friends of his in the general assembly, both Republicans and Democrats, into trouble, because he knew that this money was being paid to him corruptly, and that friends of his in the general assembly, both Republicans and Democrats, were also implicated in the corrupt receiving of money? That is why he was afraid; is it not? What other explanation can be made for this man's fear? What other reason can even be conjectured why he should be reluctant about frankly admitting that he met these men in St. Louis and received this money?

If you sit down and think about it, think about the manner in which it was done, the circumstances that surrounded it, can any Senator give himself any satisfactory reason why Mr. Link should be afraid that the giving of this information to the public would make trouble for his friends in the legislature, except because it was a corrupt and guilty transaction for which they were all amenable under the law?

Q. Who were your friends?—A. I had a great many friends on the Republican side and on the Democratic side in the general assembly.

Q. How would you get your friends into trouble by telling the truth, if this were a perfectly honest and legitimate transaction?—A. I didn't know how it would get them into trouble, only it struck me I might get them into trouble.

Can any one have an answer for it except that he knew as well as he knew he was in existence that it was a miserable, dirty, criminal transaction, that he was not the only one involved, but that there was a whole brood of them involved in it over at Springfield? Ah, that explains the testimony; and you can not explain it in any other way.

Q. You didn't care to admit that some one had given you $1,000 without any explanation about it?—A. No, sir.

Now, about this question of duress a little further. This does not appear in the testimony in the report, but Beckemeyer was asked—this is on page 254 of the record—

Q. Were there any threats or duress used upon you for the purpose of making you tell anything with reference to the Lorimer payment of money that you have testified to here?—A. There was not.

We are informed here directly by a telegram which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] put in the record, that Mr. Keeler—I think that was his name—who undertook over in Chicago to swear that a third-degree process was used to compel these witnesses to swear falsely, has been convicted of perjury for making such statements.

You can not break this testimony down on the theory that duress was used. That claim is absolutely exploded and absolutely destroyed. I quote from the testimony:

Q. Did you tell the truth then as you have told it now?—A. Yes, sir.

Where is your duress? There is none. You can not get away from the testimony of Link and Beckemeyer and Holstlaw by technicalities. Someone said that they testified that they intended to vote for LORIMER and they would have voted for LORIMER without having this money paid to them. Does anybody for a moment believe that they were at Springfield passing the boodle around in chunks of $1,000 and $900 to men who were going to "deliver the goods" without it? It is absolutely ridiculous. This man Holstlaw says that Broderick told him that if he voted for Mr. LORIMER there was $2,500 in it.

Shephard is a very peculiar man. He talked a good deal when he was on the witness stand, and explained that when Browne came to him and wanted him to vote for LORIMER he told him he could not do it; that he was a dyed-in-the-wool Democrat. But finally he intimated that he might do it if he could get the post-office matter adjusted at Jerseyville. Jerseyville is his town. The postmaster there owned a newspaper and had abused him for a good many years; he did not like that editor and did not like the deputy. He said if he could be assured that neither of these men would be appointed postmaster at Jerseyville he might consider this proposition. Browne said: "We can not do anything with that; that is not in our jurisdiction; that is a Federal matter." Shephard would not give him any encouragement, so he says; but a few days afterwards Mr. Browne came to him again and said: "I have found out that this postmastership is in Congressman RAINEY's district, and RAINEY is a Democrat. RAINEY can not control the appointment of postmasters at Jerseyville, because he is a Democrat, and the Senator will control the appointment of postmasters down there. It is different from what I thought it was the other day when we were talking about it."

I am not quoting that testimony literally, but I am giving the substance of it. Well, Shephard was hopeful at once. He wanted to get the scalps of these newspaper men who had been abusing him down there at Jerseyville, and he wanted a pledge that they should not have the post office. It was not a question of their fitness for the post office; it was not a question with him as to whether they would be excellent servants of the public or of the post office; it was not a question with him of the public service or the public welfare at all; but he wanted to drive a bargain by which, whether it interfered with the public service or injured it, he could keep that newspaper man and his deputy, or whatever he was, out of that post office. Browne said: "I have found out that is different; that is in Congressman RAINEY's district. He is a Democrat. LORIMER can do something about that." So he took him to LORIMER and Shephard laid this situation before him and wanted him to state whether or not he could control the appointment at Jerseyville and keep these men out. "Well," said LORIMER, "I have got my voice in the distribution of patronage as United States Senator, and I do not see why I can not keep them out. I will undertake to do my best to keep them out"—or words to that effect—I am not undertaking to give it literally correct, but I am giving it substantially as it is—and he assured him that he would see that they were not put in. Shephard said, "Well, I will vote for you."

It did not stop there. I do not know what else occurred. That is probably not all that occurred. I would not say but that this is all that occurred between Mr. Shephard and Mr. LORIMER. But Shephard's connection with these deals does not seem to end there, Mr. President. He voted for LORIMER; but he appeared at St. Louis on both occasions when the other boodlers were there. How do you account for that? You can not get away from that. This Henry Shephard was there both times. This was the identical Henry who wanted to settle the postmastership at Jerseyville, and he turned up when there was some feed over at St. Louis to be distributed, apparently to get his share. He says he did not get any money; but it does not look right. I am not satisfied with Henry Shephard's denial. I do not know what he was there for if he was not there to get some money. That is what the other fellows were there for. I do not know what he was there for on both these dates when these other men were there, why he appeared at the hotel where they were, why he went to the same room where they went, and why he went to his vault in the Commercial Trust Co.'s bank, why Mr. Beckemeyer should hear Mr. Wilson say, "I have a $500 bill for Shephard," if Shephard was not mixed up with the distribution of this money, both of what was called the "Lorimer money" and what was called the "jack-pot" money? You can not explain satisfactorily to a reasonable man that Shephard happened over there accidentally both times in that great city of St. Louis, and landed over there at that hotel, where these other fellows met, and went right to the very spot where the corrupt money was being distributed, and got right into the inner circle, into the bathroom where it was being paid, and then undertake to say that Henry Shephard just happened to be over there to get some packing for his automobile. He fixed the date for getting the packing at the identical date that Lee O'Neil Browne was inviting these men to meet him there and later on when Wilson was inviting them to meet him there. Oh, Henry's skirts are not clean; Henry's conduct has a bad odor about it. He made a corrupt agreement about his post office, and after that was made satisfactorily he got into the other deals. He got in them, and he got his pay—his part of the swag.

Beckemeyer, White, Link, Holstlaw, Luke, and Clark are in this so deep that I confess I can not understand how any person on earth can read this testimony and say that those votes were not corrupt votes, absolutely corrupt votes, corrupt as they were cast for Mr. LORIMER, because there was a consideration in money that induced them to go where they did. Lee O'Neil Browne, we were told the other day, did not deliver any votes, but friends of Mr. LORIMER delivered Lee O'Neil Browne and he could not help himself. That is a remarkable condition of things when Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne, who has been heralded here as a wonderful man, and whose testimony has been quoted over and over again as the basis for claiming that White's testimony ought to be disregarded, Link's testimony ought to be disregarded, Beckemeyer's testimony ought to be disregarded; and this man Browne claims that he had 30 votes that were under his leadership and that went where he wanted them to go, and that he in his repeated interveiws with Mr. Shurtleff and Mr. LORIMER insisted that they should not one of them be cast for Mr. LORIMER unless they would elect him, and that after that understanding was reached he went at it himself and his lieutenants and made a canvass to get these 30 men in line. He admits that himself. That very night they met at the St.

Nicholas Hotel. They had conferences. They made reports to Mr. LORIMER and Mr. Shurtleff, and finally reported that the 30 votes could be delivered, and the election came off the next day.

Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne, who had been the choice of these men for minority leader, admits that he had this understanding with Mr. Shurtleff and with Mr. LORIMER himself, and that he had started out to get for him these votes. Mr. LORIMER claims that he himself got only 34; he had to get 19 more; and who got them? John Broderick and Lee O'Neil Browne and their lieutenants got them. And how did they get them? Mr. LORIMER does not claim to have had personal influence enough to get any beyond the 34; and he says his friends got the rest. How did they get them? They got them in the manner that this record discloses. Lee O'Neil Browne's friends delivered him? Well, that is utterly ridiculous in view of Lee O'Neil Browne's testimony as he has given it to us here in the record.

He says on page 665 that these 30 men voted upon a signal, and that signal came in the form of a statement "yea" or "nay" made by Manny Abrahams; that that was the signal upon which they as a faction all decided how they were going to vote, right or wrong.

This man had control of these men, and he wanted all there was in it for his influence and control over them, and he used his power and influence over these men for the purpose of getting money, and he used it in this case for that purpose, and the testimony discloses that he so used it.

Now, I claim that Mr. Shurtleff and Mr. LORIMER and Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne were working together; that these three events which occurred at Springfield—the election of Speaker Shurtleff, the selection of Lee O'Neil Browne as minority leader, and the uniting of interests between LORIMER's friends and those handling the jack-pot money—that these three facts all worked together and resulted in the election of Mr. LORIMER.

My claim, based upon these three facts and what followed them, is denied, and it is attempted to get away from them by undertaking to show that Gov. Deneen was responsible for Mr. Shurtleff's election as speaker because he had abused his authority and his position as governor at Springfield in undertaking to dictate as to the organization of the legislature. I undertook to explain to-day how that claim was absolutely unfounded, because this contest against Gov. Deneen began in the campaign before the election in November. It began immediately after the primaries at which the governor was nominated; and his opponent at the primaries, ex-Gov. Yates, joined forces with Mr. LORIMER, and they practically bolted Mr. Deneen's nomination, and moved heaven and earth to beat him, so that he carried the State by only 20,000 or something like that when President Taft carried it by a very large majority.

When the legislature met at Springfield this opposition to Gov. Deneen, which began in the primary fight and contest and was waged after it and up to the election, went on and on and on, and it was not necessary for LORIMER to be out at Springfield in person, because he had his lieutenants there and everywhere in the State carrying on this contest to overthrow a governor in his own party. They were the men who succeeded in keeping out of the caucus of their own party and going in with the Democrats in electing Shurtleff speaker and securing the control of the legislature.

To show that I am right about that, I will read from a speech made in the Senate in May, 1910, by Mr. LORIMER, giving an account of the enmity toward him on the part of the Chicago Tribune, and in this speech, which I find on page 7294 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under date of May 28, 1910, this statement:

> After another bitter contest for governor in 1904 the newspapers succeeded, and Deneen became the Republican Party nominee for governor and was elected governor of Illinois. The strife continued in the party during his whole term. During the last year of the governor's term Senator Hopkins urged me to join with other Republicans, with a view to selecting a candidate to oppose Deneen for the Republican nomination for governor in 1908, and promised his support. In March of that year the friends of Gov. Yates urged him to become a candidate, which he did. He had the support of the organization Republicans in Cook County, who had organized the State with the friends of the Yates administration and succeeded in electing Hopkins Senator a few years prior.
> It was not until after Yates announced his candidacy that Hopkins went over to the Tribune newspaper combination, made his peace, joined with them and prevented his friends from supporting Yates, and urged them to support Deneen. When I discussed his attitude with Senator Hopkins, and told him that he was the first man to urge me to support a candidate other than Deneen for governor, he admitted the fact, but said he must hold to his present course or Deneen and the newspapers would defeat him for reelection.

Then he goes on to speak about the primary afterwards, as follows:

> But actions speak plainer than words and sentiment. Over 400,000 votes were cast for governor. Deneen was nominated by about 10,000 majority. Yates's friends were overwhelmed with the proof that almost every man with whom Hopkins had influence in the State, at Hopkins's request, had supported Deneen, while the friends of Yates had supported Hopkins and carried the territory for him in which they lived.
> After the defeat of Gov. Yates, all of the power of the city, county, State, and Federal administrations, under the leadership of Senator Hopkins, Gov. Deneen, and Mayor Busse, assembled into a misfit organization to make the final assault upon and destroy the last vestige of the Republican organization that had stood as a stone wall against the dictatorship of the Tribune and its newspaper combination for many years past. I was removed from the executive committee of the party.

These were the Lorimer Republicans. Does anybody mean to say that after this long, hard contest between Hopkins and Deneen and LORIMER and Yates, Mr. LORIMER and his friends went down to Springfield, or that Mr. LORIMER's friends—he being here—went down to Springfield and did not undertake to elect some man for speaker of the house whom neither Deneen nor Hopkins could control, elect some man for speaker of the house who would not use the patronage as speaker for either of them? Ah, no; no one can believe that. They went down there to put in for speaker some one who would be absolutely against Gov. Deneen and absolutely independent of Mr. Hopkins, and they were so determined to do that that they would not go into a Republican caucus. They stayed out of a Republican caucus. They would not agree as party men to accept the decision of a caucus in selecting a speaker, but they went over completely and formed an alliance with the Democrats.

Mr. BRISTOW. Formed a new party.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; these regulars, always so regular and always so loyal, who always take their medicine, to hear them tell it, and never falter, and never fail, when they got licked out by Gov. Deneen and Mr. Hopkins at the primaries, bolted. They went against their ticket, moved heaven and earth to defeat their own candidate, and then went down to the legislature and refused to go into a caucus, refused to have anything to do with the caucus, because they were in the minority, and went over openly and made an alliance with the Democrats and selected Shurtleff speaker. Do you tell me that this election of a speaker was not an anti-Deneen and an anti-Hopkins matter, a Lorimer bipartisan Democratic-Republican-alliance victory, and I snap my fingers. I say you have not read this testimony nor studied the logic of it if you do not know that that is what they did, and nothing else. When they got Mr. Shurtleff elected speaker, whether at that particular time Mr. LORIMER was intending to be a candidate for the Senate or not is immaterial, because, as the history afterwards developed, it was one of the powerful occurrences which was necessary to a favorable situation which caused him to be a candidate afterwards.

You say he had nothing to do with the election of Lee O'Neil Browne as minority leader. Perhaps not directly, but the fact that a man of Lee O'Neil Browne's character, corrupt habits, unscrupulous habits, was selected as minority leader and put in control of the minority patronage in the State was a fact which, along with the selection of Shurtleff as speaker, played into the hands of the men who were determined to defeat Mr. Hopkins and to prevent Gov. Deneen from controlling the situation.

Well, when these two steps had occurred, then came the question of making the most of the situation which existed there in which such men as Browne and Holstlaw and Beckemeyer and Link and Luke and Shephard could be brought into line through the influence of this jack pot. That was another related fact, along with the control of the speakership, along with the power which Lee O'Neil Browne had as minority leader, which enabled Mr. LORIMER and his faction to hope that they could control the election of the United States Senator. So after they had got into the saddle in this way, supposing we admit that through the influence and popularity which Mr. LORIMER had built up in the deep-waterway movement, and through his influence as the organization head over there in Chicago, and the favors he had bestowed here and there upon such men as Manny Abrahams, that he could in an emergency secure, say, 34 votes, which he claimed, he did not have enough; there were 19 short; he had to get them somewhere, and the question in this case is, How did he get them? I never have gone to the extent of saying that he personally went out and bought them. Although he seemed to feel that I dealt unfairly with him in regard to it, what I said about that part of it is in the speech which I delivered here January 10, in which I said:

> And one can conclude, after carefully reading all the evidence here, that Mr. LORIMER himself did not know that fraud was being committed. I wish I could believe that he did not, because I bear him no ill will and would not do him the smallest injury or injustice knowingly.

I meant every word of that.

I said this morning, and I say it again, that I can not understand the vindictive man. I do not know how to read the malicious man; he is a mystery to me. I can realize something about a fitful temper; I have a little of that myself; but the man who is vindictive and malicious, and out of malice and in a vindictive spirit would do harm to his fellow man, either to his character or in any other way, I can not understand. I used this language:

I wish I could believe that he did not, because I bear him no ill will and would not do him the smallest injury or injustice knowingly.

Why should I? He never harmed me in the world. If it were a mere personal matter between him and me and not this question, which, to my mind, is the infliction of an awful wound in the heart of the Republic itself, I would be glad to waive it myself.

But I can not overlook the fact that for days and nights immediately preceding the 26th day of May, 1909, when these corrupt and tainted votes were cast for him, he was in Springfield.

He said he had a right to be there. I say he had a right to be there, but I say he was there "directing his own campaign"—he admits that—that he was in almost constant conference with Lee O'Neil Browne. He did not admit that, but that appears—he did not deny it, and the testimony of these other witnesses shows it—that—he was in almost constant conference with Lee O'Neil Browne, and Speaker Shurtleff reported progress to him, and that he assured Shephard, the Democrat, personally, that he would procure the appointment of his friend as postmaster—

I think that is a little too broad; that he would prevent the appointment of his enemy is more correct—at Jerseyville if Shephard would vote for him, and that Shephard afterwards turned up with the other boodlers at St. Louis on June 21 and July 15 to get his share of the money reward distributed by Browne and Wilson; and Mr. LORIMER, personally, had a talk with Link before his election and secured Link's promise to vote for him, and that this same Link also appeared with the boodlers at St. Louis and got his reward in cash.

Now, that is absolutely true.

Mr. President—

I said—that Mr. LORIMER knew enough about what was going on at Springfield to put a reasonably prudent man upon inquiry.

Upon inquiry; that is all.

Now, he perhaps was not a "reasonably prudent man." He may have been overconfident; he may have been led by his friendship for these men to absolutely trust them and innocently believed that they were doing nothing but what was perfectly regular. I do not go to the extent of saying otherwise; but I say that it was a situation which should have put a reasonably prudent man upon inquiry. The courts of equity ever since chancery courts were first established to do what was just and right as between men in equity and in good conscience have held men responsible for what occurred through agencies they put in motion and under circumstances that would put a reasonable man upon inquiry. No one can deny that this is a sound proposition. If I select my agent and send him to do certain things for me, and he is engaged in my presence in using methods and devices that are fraudulent, I may not have actual knowledge of what he is doing; but if the facts and circumstances surrounding his conduct are such as would put a reasonable person upon inquiry and I accept the fruits of his conduct, then I am held responsible for it.

That is as far as I went—that there was enough occurring there to put a reasonable man upon inquiry—

That Shurtleff and Browne were his political agents and that he ratified their acts and accepted the fruits of their corrupt practices, of which he must at least have had some knowledge, and that he was not legally and duly elected.

That is as far as I went, and I think it is a fair and just conclusion from the record and the testimony in this case.

Now, were Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne and Mr. Shurtleff acting as the representatives of Mr. LORIMER or not? What does this testimony show? I will call attention to it.

Mr. Browne says, in his testimony, after this conversation with Mr. Shurtleff, he said Shurtleff had come to him a few days before the election—two or three weeks—and asked him to ascertain how many of his followers would vote for Mr. LORIMER. Now, just think of this. Here was Mr. Shurtleff, a Republican speaker of the house of representatives, elected by Democrats and Lorimer Republicans, who came to Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne and asked him to ascertain how many of his fellows would vote for LORIMER. You will find that on pages 592 and 594 of this record. He asked him how many of his friends would vote for LORIMER. Then he was asked:

Now, after this conversation with Mr. Shurtleff did you consider the proposition which he made or suggested?

Browne says:

I did.

Q. You gave it very serious thought?—A. Yes, sir (p. 594).

Q. Now, after you made up your mind and after your talk with Mr. Shurtleff and weeks or few days of consideration by yourself, did you have any talk with Mr. LORIMER—

Ah, here is Lee ONeil Browne and Mr. LORIMER coming together here—with reference to his candidacy?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When, for the first time?—A. I can not tell you.

Q. Can't tell us how soon after you made up your mind to be with him that you had a talk with him?—A. No; because I did not notify him first.

Q. Who did you notify first?—A. My recollection is that I gave Mr. Shurtleff an answer (p. 594).

Q. And you told Mr. LORIMER of that fact?—A. Conditionally.

Q. There was a condition?—A. Yes.

Q. And what was that condition?—A. I stated to Mr. Shurtleff, and I stated afterwards to Mr. LORIMER, that I would not consent to having a single one of the Democrats that I had any influence with cast a vote for Senator LORIMER unless his election was an assured thing; that I would not have those votes cast away absolutely (p. 595).

Why should Lee O'Neil Browne be so insistent that these 30 votes which he claimed he controlled should not be cast for Mr. LORIMER unless they would elect him? What was the reason? If he was a friend who wanted LORIMER elected unselfishly, why not cut loose and give him the benefit of his vote and give him a boom, whatever it is? Oh, no; not one should vote for him unless their votes should elect him. Why was such a condition as that put on? The votes would not be worth anything unless they delivered the goods, would they? They would not have any commercial value unless they were the means of procuring the election. That is what Browne wanted. This man Browne was a sharp bargainer in the political corruption business. He wanted the goods. He wanted the money, and he wanted to have the votes delivered so that they would have a commercial value. That is why this debate the day Mr. LORIMER was elected occurred, when he said on the floor he could not cash dreams, and English said: "Yes, but you can cash votes." English knew him. Mr. English knew what kind of man he was talking with there, who was getting up and saying you can not cash dreams, and it came back like a shot from English, "Yes, but you can cash votes." English knew what had been going on. Rotten things had been going on. This testimony shows that. After Shurtleff and Browne and Mr. LORIMER entered into this cooperation they began to make this canvass to get these 19 votes; Mr. LORIMER with his great personal influence—and I can compliment him on his fascinating victory over great obstacles and in the way he has made his way up in the world. I am glad to see that, but I say there were 19 votes they had to get for him.

Mr. President, I am willing to admit that the Senator from Illinois was in Washington on the 7th of January, as he says, and voted on a motion over in the House of Representatives; but I insist that, following that Yates-Deneen fight in Illinois, the lines were drawn and he had that following intact. When they went to Springfield they knew very well that it was a part of their business to see to it that neither Gov. Deneen nor Mr. Hopkins was permitted to select the speaker or to control the speaker. They were willing to bolt their party, to refuse to go into the caucus, to make an alliance with the Democrats, and do almost anything in order to secure control of the organization of the house and the patronage of the house. There was a Senator to be elected, and there was a $20,000,000 issue of bonds to be made in their deep-waterway project. These forces were contending for the control of both. I say that the election of this speaker was a part of this program, and that in his election they were willing to turn away from and absolutely throw to the winds the wish of that large vote which had been cast for Senator Hopkins.

I do not claim that every man who voted for Mr. Shurtleff knew what this game was, for he did not. Many an honest man undoubtedly, through plausible reasons, voted for him. I suppose they worked the claim that Gov. Deneen was trying to dictate who should be speaker for all there was in it. No doubt they shook that, like a red flag in the face of a bull, for all there was in it, and many a voter may have been misled by it; but the men who were playing that game of politics knew what they were doing. Do not forget that.

Any child in politics can see that there was method in this proceeding. The cry that the governor was undertaking to usurp the legislative function and dictate who should be speaker of the house, was a mere political strategy, according to the ways of machine politicians and their methods. I can see through that. It was a game; and I said when I made my speech on January 10 it was a game. I say here to-night it was a game, and nothing but a game.

The distinguished junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. YOUNG] is known all over the United States for the statement he has made that politics is a great game. That is the way they regard it in Illinois; and this was a game these fellows were playing. They wanted the speaker and in a cold-blooded way they proposed to have him, because they wanted to control the patronage and the issuance of these waterway bonds; they wanted to be in on the ground floor in the selection of a United States Senator, and they wanted to score one against Hopkins and against Deneen, and they did not care how. They went into this deal with the Democrats in cold blood—that is plain enough—for the purpose of preventing them from controlling this legislature and putting their own tools in the saddle. That is plain enough; anybody can see that; and they scored in their game.

I do not claim for a moment—I want to be fair—that the Senator from Illinois had anything to do with this election of Lee O'Neil Browne by the Democrats as minority leader. Lee O'Neil Browne managed that; but when Lee O'Neil Browne became minority leader, knowing the kind of a man Lee O'Neil Browne is, knowing what Lee O'Neil Browne would do if there was something in it, they went into a deal to use him and his 30 robbers—as the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] calls them—for all there was in it; and they made a deal with him to deliver just as many of them as he could to Mr. LORIMER. He started out to get them.

Now, I come to the things which happened while he was trying to get them. They wanted votes, and they wanted them badly. They had 34 Democrats, but that was not enough; they had to have 19 more. They went out to get them. This man Groves tells us how they tried to get him. Mr. Groves was a bluff old Democrat, apparently of the old school. I admire him very much from reading the testimony. He was an outspoken, courageous, and honest man, a Democrat of whom the Democrats can be proud. He was asleep in his bed in his room in the hotel after this agreement had been entered into between Shurtleff, Lee O'Neil Browne, and Mr. LORIMER that they should go out and get these votes. Groves was in his bed in the hotel, and Douglas Patterson, an ex-member of the legislature, raps on Groves's door. Mr. Groves gets out of his bed and opens the door, and in comes Douglas. Douglas says, "Mr. Groves, I think it could be made a matter of mutual profit to you and to me for you to vote to-morrow for Mr. LORIMER." Ah, Douglas evidently had lived in this corrupt atmosphere at Springfield, where they had the jack pot and the existence of which he knew, and he thought he could go into bluff old Jacob Groves's room and say to him, "I want you to vote for LORIMER to-morrow, and it will be to the mutual advantage of both of us." So he made that suggestion. Mr. Groves said, "There is not enough money in Springfield to buy my vote for BILL LORIMER." Patterson said, "Put down the transom; you are talking too loud." Groves was an honest man. He blurted out what he thought of this kind of business, "There is not money enough in Springfield, or in Illinois"—whichever it was—"to buy my vote or to cause me to vote for BILL LORIMER." Patterson wanted the transom put down at once, and wanted to make his escape. He saw he had made a mistake.

Is there any testimony in this record to dispute this statement of Jacob Groves? Where is it?

That is the testimony. It is not questioned; it is not disputed. It stands here in the record absolutely uncontradicted from any source.

What does that indicate—this ex-member of the legislature in the dead hours of the night, gently rapping upon the door of Mr. Groves, a member of the legislature, and on being admitted saying to him, "I want you to vote for LORIMER to-morrow"—this man Groves was a Democrat—"and it might be to the mutual advantage of both of us?" When the answer rings out through the transom, "There is not money enough in Springfield to buy my vote for BILL LORIMER," the reply is, "Please put down the transom."

Draw your own conclusions, Senators, as to that transaction. I think you know what it meant.

I come now to Henry Terrill. Henry Terrill was a Republican, and he was a Hopkins man. Terrill evidently believed that he was bound by the expression given by the voters of his State. He met Mr. John Griffin, the man whose vote Hinky Dink, I think it was, assured Mr. LORIMER that he would get if he was a candidate for Senator. Hinky Dink got Griffin to vote for LORIMER, and Griffin met Terrill when they were out ransacking for Democratic votes, and asked him to vote for LORIMER. Terrill asked Griffin what there would be in it. Terrill was trying to find out. I suppose he had heard some rumors around town that money was being used to get votes; so he asked this question.

What was Griffin's answer? "Why," Griffin said, "a thousand dollars, anyway." What do you think of that? When you stop to consider that that is the exact amount paid to White, to Beckemeyer, to Link—a thousand dollars—when you stop to think that was the going price for members of the house (in the senate they got a little more because they did not have to have so many of them over there, and Holstlaw got twenty-five hundred), but in the house the regular catalogue price appears to have been $1,000.

Terrill voted for Hopkins. There is no testimony indicating that he was committing perjury when he made this statement. He could not be bought. Terrill is not discredited. There is nothing here upon which men are justified in putting aside his statement.

Ah, this was a nasty, rotten, corrupt arrangement at Springfield, and why can not Senators see it? I do not know. It surpasses my comprehension. It is so plain to me that I am amazed there should be any question about it.

Here is still another circumstance. George W. Meyers. I know what has been said about this, but George W. Meyers was a Democrat, a member of the house of representatives; and this record shows that so far as he is concerned he could not be bought. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] says he ought to have struck the man who said what he did to him. I do not think he ought to have committed a crime like that, and if what they say is true, that this jack pot had been in existence at Springfield for years, and that everybody knew it was there; that they had been buying legislation with it or suppressing legislation with it and dividing the boodle at the end of the session for years; and it was so well known that even counsel in this case on both sides accepted it as a matter of common knowledge, I do not know why Mr. Meyers should be so terribly surprised and why his virtuous indignation should work him up to the point where he ought to commit the crime of assault and battery on the floor of the senate because this man Browne said to him there is plenty of the "ready necessary."

I know that the Senator from New Hampshire, with all of the indignation of an honest man, would resent such a suggestion as that if made to him, and I do not know but that he might strike such a man, but the Senator from New Hampshire is not Representative Meyers, and he has not lived in an atmosphere like that of Springfield. He has not lived in a community that has become so benumbed apparently that a matter of a jack pot used for the purpose of buying legislation and selling it is accepted as a matter of course. So the way he would look at it and the way Mr. Meyers, who I believe is an honest man, looked at it, are two different things entirely. Mr. Meyers is not impeached. No one attacks his testimony on the ground that he is an unworthy man; not at all.

But what does Mr. Meyers say? He says that on the day of this election he was in his seat; he got a note or a summons from Mr. Browne to come over to his seat, and he went over and Mr.. Browne asked him to vote for Mr. LORIMER. Both these men were Democrats, remember. Mr. Meyers, a Democrat; Mr. Browne, a Democrat; and yet Mr. Browne, a Democrat, was asking Mr. Meyers, a Democrat, to vote for a Republican. He said to him he would like to have Mr. Meyers go with him, because they were going to elect Mr. LORIMER, and that there were plenty of good jobs and the ready necessary, and that Mr. Meyers says, "Lee, I can not do it."

Then the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] would lead us to believe because he protested he could not do it, but did not commit a crime by assaulting this man, that it is evident he is an untruthful witness. I think that is an unwarranted conclusion. I do not think it is reasonable. I do not think it is natural. I do not think it is justified. I think the answer that Mr. Meyers made, considering the time, the conditions surrounding it, was just about the answer that the average honest member of the legislature would make.

Senators refuse to be surprised at the testimony of these other witnesses in relation to what occurred at St. Louis and in Chicago, but when it comes to this incident connected with Mr. Meyers they throw up their hands in horror and say it could not have occurred, because Mr. Meyers would have immediately reported this man and prosecuted him or beaten him.

Mr. Meyers makes the statement that Mr. Browne said to him that they had good State jobs to give away and "the ready necessary." Some one says, "Why, the idea of Mr. Meyers going over to Mr. Browne's desk in the open session upon the floor of the assembly hall and such a conversation occurring there in the open session is absolutely preposterous." How many Senators make note of what happens between two Senators if one goes over to the seat of another and exchanges quietly, perhaps in whispered conversation, a few words with that other Senator? They do not notice what is said once in a hundred times, because they are not eavesdroppers meddling with the affairs of other Senators. There was no occasion for them to make note of what occurred, and it is absolutely absurd for men to say that this could not occur without everybody knowing it.

There is not a Senator on this floor who could not go to another Senator and, in an undertone, carry on a conversation about some matter and go back again and not another soul in the Senate except those two men know what they said to each other. Now, you all know that. I do not think this is an extraordinary thing at all, or an unnatural thing under the circumstances which prevailed at Springfield.

Mr. Meyers said that this occurred. Mr. Browne denies it; but Mr. Browne is a scoundrel, and everybody knows it, and Mr. Meyers is a reputable man, against whom not one word can be said except what may be claimed from these circumstances. He did not sell his vote.

They tried to show by a page that the page did not see him go over to Browne's seat. There is nothing in that. Would what a page might say with reference to an event that occurred 14 months ago, that he did not see a Senator from this side of the Chamber go over to exchange a word or two with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], be considered as evidence against the fact that he did go? It is not worthy of consideration at all. It has absolutely no value.

George Alschuler—I have heard nothing said against him as a man; I do not know anything about him—sat back two or three seats behind Browne, and he said he did not see this, but it might easily occur and Mr. Alschuler not see it or hear what was said. He was in no position to deny it a year and a half afterwards.

But Mr. Meyers, who did know, who was the one to whom the remarks were addressed, the one to whom the appeal was made, who was the one whose vote was sought, said it did occur and that this man did solicit his vote and tell him they had the good State jobs and the "ready necessary."

I can not refuse to believe the statement of Mr. Meyers. He is unimpeached. He is not discredited. He is not attacked by any testimony that appeals to me, and his statement fits in with the statement of Henry Terrill, which shows what was going on. It fits in with the statement of Jacob Groves, which shows what was going on. It harmonizes with the admitted fact that there was a corruption fund there. Then, in the same connection, about the same time, is this Holstlaw transaction that I have reviewed over and over again. I can not drive my mind and coerce my faculties into any process of reasoning by which I can get away from the compelling force of all this testimony. I can not get away from it.

Senators must not expect me to get away from it. I can not. I have no prejudice in this case, but I have got to be governed by my judgment and my convictions, and I can not get away from it.

I am a country lawyer and I have tried a good many cases, some of them involving a good many thousand dollars, some of them involving human life and sacred personal rights, and I have had some experience in weighing testimony.

I can not get away from the compelling force of this testimony nor throw it aside nor reject it nor escape the logical conclusion that it forces upon me that this transaction between Holstlaw and Broderick was a corrupt transaction and a crime. Then there is De Wolf. They said "poor old Jacob De Wolf," whom I have abused. Jacob appeared to be around hunting for some Republican to deliver his vote to from the time the thing started almost. Jacob wanted to deliver his vote to Hopkins and tried to go and organize the Democrats for the purpose of delivering them to a Republican, and I see in this record that Jacob over and over again during the various roll calls voted for Lee O'Neil Browne for Senator.

What do you think of the purity of motive and disinterestedness of De Wolf when he was a blind follower of Lee O'Neil Browne, voted for Lee O'Neil Browne for Senator, and followed Manny Abrahams as his bellwether? In August, just after these transactions occurred in St. Louis, where money was paid, Jacob makes a payment on his real-estate transaction of $600. I do not like the looks of that myself.

Joe Clark, outside of Lee O'Neil Browne, was one of the smoothest villains of them all, but he left behind him a trail of the most suspicious circumstances all the way through. He happened over here at St. Louis on both occasions. He tells White, so White says, that if it had not been for him Link, I think it was, would have delivered his vote for less than what he did, but that he induced him to hold out and got his thousand dollars.

Oh, these votes were not honest votes. These Democratic votes cast for a Republican, with all these circumstances so well established about them, were tainted votes, corrupt votes. To use not elegant English but truthful English, the transaction was rotten.

Beckemeyer, White, Holstlaw, Link, Luke, Wilson, Browne, and Broderick, everyone of them Democrats who voted for Lee O'Neil Browne and by this testimony so clearly established that I can not escape it, voted for him for a consideration in money. This can not be set aside as a trifling matter, not to be seriously considered. The personal equation, the kindly feeling toward the sitting Member, the reluctance about putting him to any inconvenience and having him go out of here with this history of these transactions connected with him, are expected to overbalance and put away from consideration these tremendously serious facts in regard to fraud and corruption in connection with the votes cast for the sitting Member.

Mr. President, if the elections in the United States are to be the subject of cold-blooded purchase, what does this Government amount to? You arraign these poor people over in Adams County, Ohio, because they sold their votes, but you never hear a word said about the men who bought their votes. In this day and generation, where poor people are struggling for an existence in this world, and where in some localities they are pressed by hunger and by want, I can see some excuse for them. I say that there is some excuse for the poor man driven by hunger and by want and by privation, if they yield to the temptation and sell their votes, because they need the money to buy bread. But I ask, where is the excuse for the man who has the money and who seeks to use it by corrupting the ballot box, who goes out and holds this gold up in the face of these poor people and tempts them by that gold to sell their honor and to corruptly deliver their votes?

If that sort of thing is to go unchallenged and be accepted as a matter of course, the American Republic is fast approaching its end. What are we to think or contemplate if in this day of which we speak so often, when great fortunes have been amassed, where the holdings of one man may mount up until they are counted not by millions, but by billions, if this wealth is to be used among the poor for the purpose of buying from them their honor? What is to become of the American Republic?

It will not last long. And yet a situation like this we view apparently with indifference, and look at it, not from the standpoint of the public welfare, not from the standpoint of the preservation of purity in our national life; all that is treated as too far way, and the whole issue narrows down to a feeling that the purpose of the investigation is the protection of the good name of the sitting Member. To my mind this matter is so fundamentally serious; it reaches so deep; its consequences are such a menace to our national life, to the public welfare, to the existence of the Government itself, that I can not think of the incumbent of the office except as a mere incident of secondary consideration and that the integrity of the election, the integrity of our political institutions, are vastly more important.

We live in an atmosphere of indifference, of self-satisfied existence. We do not borrow trouble on account of to-morrow; we are living for to-day. We are absolutely drunk with power. The great corporation or the political machine which has power gets drunk with power. It exercises it for the very love of exercising it, and feels a delight in crushing with a steam roller, or some other process, every helpless individual who stands in its way, and gloats in it and glories in it. There is too much of that. It becomes unscrupulous. If you can not win one way, win another, because the only thing in the world is success, no matter how you get it. All you are asked to do is to win, no matter how. Power without scruple is what counts. Results are what tell. If you have money, use it. If you need votes and do not know any other way to get them, buy them—just so you get them. This is the creed of wealth and power with its boss and its machine.

I am not overdrawing this picture. So help me, God, I am telling the truth about it. Make a great big purse, and each man put, and each company put up, and go to Springfield with it; go to some other town with it, and use it and get results; that is what you are asked to do. What is going to become of the integrity of our political life if we are to treat with callous indifference a situation like this?

Throw it to one side and say that the man who is trying to stand for honesty in these things is playing to the galleries; that he is simply bidding for the support of the muckraking magazines to make himself prominent; that he is not sincere; he is a reformer. Ah, it will not do to treat a question like this by dismissing it with such talk as that. You can not get away from it with such talk as that. I will tell you what you are going to do now, and I am not indulging in any idle prophecy: We are going to have more honesty. We are going to set our faces more sternly against situations like this at Springfield. We are going to hold men who are the beneficiaries of these transactions to a strict accountability, and if they are not here on the square we are going to turn them out or else we are going to have a revolution. I do not mean a revolution of bloodshed; no; not at all; but, whether it is wise or unwise, whether it is sound or unsound, you are going to have a revolution in our form of Government, and you will have a democracy, and a pure democracy because of the distrust that situations like this create among the people of this country.

Oh, men will just simply say that is the talk of a demagogue. It is not. These situations can be avoided if we deal with them with courage and insist upon honest elections and do not shrink from our duty when the evidence shows that there has been corruption. That is absolutely true. You can not get away from it.

I do not know, I am puzzled somewhat to conjecture, what kind of government we will have here in another generation in the United States. I do not know. The conservative does not know. The ultraconservative does not know. The radical does not know. The Democrat does not know. The ultraradical does not know. The Socialist does not know. But we all do know that changes are at work everywhere of one form and another, and we all do know that protests are coming up in one form and another, and changes are insisted upon of one kind and another. Whenever your people lose confidence in the Senate of the United States because they are convinced that men get into this body by the unlawful use of money, whether it is by themselves or without their knowledge by those who are working for them, whenever that conviction fastens itself generally throughout the United States, do you know what may happen? I do not; only I am sure something very radical will happen.

You can not dismiss this situation lightly with the charge that it is the result of demagogic attacks or of attempts to destroy character. It is too serious for that. Here are Browne, Holstlaw, Broderick, Wilson, Link, Luke, Beckemeyer, Shephard, this bunch of fellows appearing in Chicago and St. Louis getting this boodle, voting corruptly, dishonestly, and induced to do so by money, for a candidate for the United States Senate who would not be here but for those votes.

This is the testimony, testimony that ought to be considered; testimony that is read everywhere by intelligent men and honest men, just the same as we read it. They have an absolute conviction in regard to it. Is this testimony overthrown? By whom? I think it is a rule recognized everywhere that a statement made by a criminal against his own interest is good testimony. His own statement in his favor is not good. Self-serving declarations are not good; but admissions of guilt, admissions against himself are regarded as credible testimony. This testimony, especially the testimony of a man who, like White, was often found to be under the influence of drink, his discretion gone, his caution gone, giving expression, without realizing its consequences, to his thoughts; what he said under such circumstances is the most valuable kind of testimony, in my opinion, no matter how black you paint him. It is the most important kind of testimony because it is testimony where under the circumstances you can not charge him with making a statement from any selfish motive, but involuntarily he is expressing his innermost thoughts. When we find him talking with the cigar girl at O'Fallon, and down at Springfield practically offering his vote for a corrupt consideration, the man was giving expression of himself against his own interest; and, to my mind, for that very reason, his testimony is corroborative instead of self-destructive.

Last year, when Mr. LORIMER made his address, he paid a very high compliment to Lee O'Neil Browne. He could not conceive of the possibility of any person ever approaching Browne with a corrupt proposal. He said he recollected a circumstance several years ago, when he was having a pleasant chat with Mr. Browne, and Browne told him that he believed the Bible from cover to cover, that he was an exemplary Christian man. Well, Lee does not appear to be that kind of a man.

Mr. GALLINGER. He fell from grace.

Mr. CRAWFORD. He did fall with a vengeance. He fell a long way. We have painted White about as black as a man can be painted here—I think deservedly; we have made him out a dissolute wretch and a scoundrel, and yet Lee O'Neil Browne called him his "dear old pal." Lee O'Neil Browne, after this swag was distributed, set apart a time when he and his "dear old pal," White, could go off on a bumming trip and enjoy the fruits of the boodle that the one had paid to the other. The letters disclose that. They go up and down, across the Lakes, in their bacchanalian celebration. Lee O'Neil Browne—this Christian gentleman, who believes his Bible from cover to cover—is the man who finds in Mr. Charles White his choice, favorite companion. Mr. LORIMER is too trusting altogether. His confidence in men is entirely too implicit when he is led to form this opinion of Lee O'Neil Browne, who enjoyed these relations with Charles S. White. These telegrams and letters all through this record passing back and forth between Lee O'Neil Browne and White and Beckemeyer and Link unite these men together with testimony that is not dependent upon oral utterances of any of them. How are you going to get away from that? It is there; it is in the record; it can not be overthrown; it can not be successfully impeached.

Scheming interests get together over in Chicago, or somewhere else, before the legislature meets down at Springfield and each contributes a certain amount to make up a corruption fund with which to buy men, with which to buy legislation, with which to kill legislation. Is not that a fine spectacle?

Yet men look upon that as something that should be tolerated. There are not many of them who look upon it in that way, but a few do, I suppose, but not many, thank God. But there it is. Everybody seems to admit that something of that kind exists to buy men, buy legislation and suppress legislation for whom? The big interests. That is not the talk of a demagogue. It is fact which appears here, and is accepted without question. A small matter, is it? If we have grown into a state of mind where we look upon that as a small matter in this country and in the greatest legislative tribunal in the world, how much longer have we to live? A small matter, a mere trifle, a little thing not to be considered in determining the personal claim of an individual to a seat in this body, because his desire is vastly more important. Is that right? Is that the way to look at this? Is that a fair measure of the importance of this question?

The jack pot was there. Lee O'Neil Browne was next to it—mighty close to it. Beckemeyer knew about it. They all had hungry stomachs for it; they were greedy to get it, and they did get it, and, as a result of their getting it, the sitting Member got votes that he would not have gotten otherwise, and without which he would not have been elected. That is what this testimony shows. Fairly construed and fairly weighed, I do not know how you can escape the conclusion, because it is in the record.

Mr. President, if we are to consider the statement made by the sitting Member as testimony it undertakes to account for some of these Democratic votes, but it comes far short of accounting for all of them.

He gave the circumstances under which he got the vote of State Senator Hearn, a Democrat, and Mr. Gorman, a Democrat. He claimed he got Gorman through the deep waterway proposition; that Mr. Gorman lives at Peoria, and that influential people in his town, without regard to party, were in favor of Mr. LORIMER on that account, and they came up and asked that he be elected. He goes into an explanation of the vote of Gorman. He also undertakes to explain the vote of Mr. Riley on account of the deep waterway; that that was a hobby of Mr. Riley, and Mr. LORIMER had given a great deal of time and magnificent service to that; and, as an appreciation, he got the vote of Mr. Riley.

He undertakes to account for the vote of Mr. Cermak, a Democrat. He says he was honest; that he got his vote in connection with the proposed amendment to the constitution for the sale of $20,000,000 of bonds.

He says he got Henry Shephard's vote—and this is the explanation he gives for that vote:

> Then we come to Henry Shephard; and what about Henry Shephard?
>
> Well, I think there is a good deal about him—
> When the congressional party came back from New Orleans to Washington at the opening of Congress, I called a meeting of the men that had made the trip and we organized among the Members of Congress an association. When I notified Mr. RAINEY, he told me he could not attend that night because his friend Henry Shephard was in town. I invited Henry Shephard to come to that little dinner that we organized, and it was there that I first met Henry Shephard. It was there that he first became interested in this work. It was at that time that a friendship grew up between him and me that lasted until to-day. Henry Shephard was a member of the legislature, and he was for this proposition all the way through.

That is all he says about Henry; but that is not sufficient. Henry says he would not vote for LORIMER; that he was a rock-ribbed Democrat; and he would not vote for him under any circumstance, unless it was one. That was that post-office deal. Mr. LORIMER did not mention that. That is, if Shephard could prevent the appointment of his enemies down there to the post office he might vote for Mr. LORIMER, but nothing else could possibly fetch him. Mr. LORIMER said nothing about that. Henry does. He got a promise because they had a Democratic Congressman down there, and he got a promise that he accepted as a condition of his support. He got a promise from Mr. LORIMER, upon which he said he voted for LORIMER. It was a corrupt promise, too.

But that is not all connected about Henry Shephard. Henry appears in several other acts in this play. The curtain does not drop there, so far as Henry is concerned; but Henry turns up in St. Louis when the boodle is being divided. Henry gets there and lands in the Southern Hotel at a very propitious time for Henry. Henry is not in the habit of missing things like that. There was some intuition that led Henry to believe that it would be a good thing for him to go to St. Louis and be down at the Southern Hotel on a certain day, and Henry was there. So was Lee O'Neil Browne; so was the whole gang of them—Clark, Luke, Link, Beckemeyer. The whole crowd was there, and Henry was there. I think Henry got some of the swag. I do not think it was an accident. I think he knew that the money was to be divided, and he considered that he was entitled to his share, and he went there, and I would have no doubt that he got it.

Henry went home, and on the 15th of July, when these noble heroes met there again to exchange felicities, Henry was there also. Oh, yes; he went there this time to get some packing for his auto. He was there. Henry never missed a good thing. Henry's intuitions were simply remarkable, because he knew when there was to be a meeting where swag was to be divided in St. Louis, on the other side of the Mississippi River. Henry's automobile needed packing just at that time. Henry went.

Of course, Henry found it necessary for reason on the same day to visit the bank where he had a safety vault, and to visit the Southern Hotel on the same day, and to meet his old friends, whose acquaintance he had made at Springfield during the winter before, and so he appeared there.

I do not think there is any doubt that Henry got his part of the jack pot—the $900—because Beckemeyer says that when he got his Wilson says "I have this $500 for Shephard." He went over to the bank.

Mr. LORIMER goes on, after he gets through with his little statement in reference to Shephard, to explain about George Alschuler. George was a bitter enemy of Hopkins. Of course, George was a Democrat, and he could be a bitter enemy of Hopkins, and he could be a consistent Democrat by voting for a Democrat, but he was a bitter enemy of Hopkins, lived in Hopkins's town, and the fact that he was an enemy of Hopkins was used as an explanation of his vote for Mr. LORIMER. And then he was in favor of this deep-waterway movement. Suppose we accept that; do not question it at all, and pass on to the next. That is not enough.

We come then to Charles Luke, and he undertakes to explain why Charles Luke, a Democrat, voted for him by saying that Hopkins was a bitter partisan; that he had made campaign speeches over in Luke's district and had abused the Democrats, and so Luke had it in for him; and he gives that as an explanation of why Luke voted for him—LORIMER. I am not satisfied with that, because there is a whole lot more testimony here about Mr. Luke that Mr. LORIMER does not appear to know anything about.

Charles Luke seemed to have that intuition with which Henry Shephard was gifted, and when they met over in St. Louis on the 21st of June and on the 15th of July to divide the swag, Charles Luke was there both times. He was invited up into the room with the rest of them, and a great deal remains in the record identifying him with these corrupt transactions. Mrs. Luke, it is true, says the time when she saw him have $950 was before he got this telegram to meet Wilson in St. Louis on July 15. But it was some time after the legislature had adjourned, and she says he was out of town somewhere, she does not know just where, and came back with this money. The testimony indicates he went about the time these other men went to St. Louis—the first time June 21. She saw him have $950 in bills. After that she knows he got a telegram calling him to St. Louis, and he went, and the other witnesses say he was there both times.

Now that is very much more testimony than Mr. LORIMER was able to give us; and it shows that Mr. Charles Luke, who put the Democratic candidate for Senator, Mr. Stringer, in nomination, was his supporter until the 26th of May, when he flops over and votes for Mr. LORIMER.

That looks bad. It fits in with the rest of this record. It dovetails with the rest of this testimony. It indicates guilt on his part in common with that of Link and Beckemeyer.

Mr. President, this is not all imagination. This is not all manufactured story. It is preposterous, absolutely preposterous, to try to dismiss this closely connected chain of circumstances and facts and incidents, so many of them not within the control of the men who were playing their parts, by saying it is manufactured and untrustworthy. You can not get rid of it that way. It will haunt you forever afterwards, when you reflect upon it and undertake to dismiss it on the theory that it is all manufactured and untrustworthy. It is not.

There is no way to establish such a preposterous claim as that. These are established facts, from which there is no escape, and it puts a taint of corruption upon from 7 to 11 votes, and the question is, Without them would Mr. LORIMER have been elected, and would he occupy a seat here without them? He certainly would not; and if without them he would not be here, would not hold his certificate, how are we going to permit him to remain here?

If we weigh this testimony, weigh it conscientiously, and weigh it as jurors would weigh facts and testimony in the ordinary affairs of life, it seems to me there is no escape from the conclusion that there was not a valid election. I have never attempted to discuss the law of this case. It is not necessary now; it never was necessary for me to discuss it. It has never been anything but an application of a simple rule, and that is this: If this Senator would not have been elected except by receiving these tainted votes, then his certificate is invalid, although he knew nothing about it. There can be no question about that.

What I insist upon is that this testimony shows at least that much, and I insist that it also shows, not that he willfully knew and connived and participated in the fraud—I never have made that claim—but that he was present and had his agents at work, and there was enough going on during his stay there to put a reasonable man upon inquiry.

That being true, by the most simple rule of equity and chancery he is bound by what followed, and he can not accept the fruit; he can not be the recipient of the fruits of these fraudulent transactions carried on under these circumstances by these men who were going to and fro among these purchasable Democrats and using somebody's money to secure their votes for him. He can not escape personal responsibility for the acts of these men.

Mr. President, I have no doubt but that every Member of this Senate will agree with me, and agree with me without any reservation whatever, that the very existence, indeed the right to exist as a nation and as a government, depends upon the simple question whether we are honest and faithful to the underlying principles upon which this great fabric of government rests. If honor has departed and money has taken its place, if integrity has lost its force and control and commercialism has been installed in its stead, if seats in this body, representative as it is of the national life and national existence, are to be a matter of barter and sale and a mere question of purchase, we have no right to exist; we are unworthy, and the sooner we go out of business the better.

Legislators, of course, will make mistakes. It is to be expected that they will make mistakes; but if they are honest and true to their trust the mistakes are not serious. The mistakes are easily corrected, but if we are going back to the days of Robert Walpole and Lord Holland, when it is a question of buying place and corrupting voters, we had better stop that clock and turn it back and turn our faces to the rear instead of forward, because we have reached the acme, and from this time on we are going down.

No; what we must insist on here is honesty and sincerity and loyalty to conviction, and absolute loyalty to the people who sent us here.

TARIFF AND RECIPROCITY.

Mr. President, by way of digression, I wish to say that two years ago, just after I had been elected to the Senate, I came to Washington to attend an extra session of Congress. I had been in Washington but twice before in my life. I had never seen a national legislature in action but as a visitor in the gallery once or twice in the long years that preceded my election as Senator. On one of my visits Grover Cleveland was President of the United States and on the other Theodore Roosevelt. My whole experience in life had been confined largely to the great West, in the heart of which I first saw daylight on my father's farm up among the Mississippi River hills in northeastern Iowa, in an old farmhouse out in the woods, away from the roadside, in that pioneer stage of early life of Iowa when they were just opening up in the woodlands her first settlements. My father and mother were of the old stock of Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, who believed in the Westminster Catechism and practiced the Ten Commandments.

There were 12 children in the family—9 boys and 3 girls—and each one had his little Testament. The family prayer that was offered every morning was a prayer for the President of the United States and for the preservation of our Constitution and for a blessing upon the rulers of this Republic. In the convention at which I became a candidate for this office, a Republican convention, we declared for the protective tariff, but we made two or three exceptions. We wanted free coal, Mr. President, and free lumber, and free iron ore, and if there was a monopoly producing a manufactured article we wanted the tariff upon it reduced to a point which would permit importations sufficient to create competition. That was a very nice theory and it was a fine declaration to put in our platform.

We based our belief in this doctrine of free lumber and free coal and free iron ore upon the claim that it rested upon a proper conservation of our natural resources, and would promote the preservation of these resources. When we were making up the tariff bill, the question came up with reference to putting certain articles on the free list. I was for free lumber and free coal and free iron ore.

The Democratic Party in its national convention at Denver had declared for the same things, and while I had some doubt about the support of eastern Democrats or eastern Republicans from manufacturing districts for this proposition, I had no doubt but what the Democratic Party would be largely united upon the proposition that we should have in this new tariff law free lumber, free coal, and free iron ore.

I made a speech in favor of it, and I remember that in a few days afterwards a member of the Senate, whom I learned to love, because he was a true gentleman, one of nature's noblemen, a gentleman of the old school, and always kind to me—a Democrat—who sat here or near here—Senator Daniel, of Virginia—stood up here and made an address, in which he opposed putting lumber on the free list, and he opposed putting coal on the free list, and he told us in an inimitable way why he objected to removing the tariff from lumber and from iron ore. He went on to tell how in Virginia thousands of laboring men were dependent upon their labor in the iron mines for the support of their families, and how they went down into the poison-laden vapors of those mines and took their lives in their hands for the purpose of earning a wage there that would enable them to support their families. He protested against permitting iron ore to come into this country from Cuba free, which might interfere with the opportunity of those laboring men in Virginia to earn their living.

He opposed for the same reason largely the removal of the tariff from lumber, and I remember how he stood up behind his desk here and put his crutches over against it and looked with a sort of proud and haughty air over the Senate Chamber and said:

> I do not care what you call this; you may call it a tariff for revenue, or you may call it a tariff for protection, but it is a good thing for Virginia, and I am for it.

So I discovered that my dear old friend, Senator Daniel, in the making up of this tariff, felt that he was obliged to represent what he considered the best interests of the people in Virginia, the State which he represented; and while I, a Republican from a Republican State, was advocating the placing of lumber upon the free list and iron ore upon the free list and coal upon the free list, notwithstanding the Democratic platform at Denver had declared for the same things, this doughty old Democratic warrior from the grand old Commonwealth of Virginia, the mother of Presidents, was arguing for a substantially protective tariff upon lumber and coal and iron ore.

I remember also that during that debate the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who so ably represents his State here, with his associate, made a speech in which he defended a tariff upon lumber, and made what it seemed to me was a very good Republican protective tariff speech.

I remember that when we passed over into the State of Georgia, one of the Democratic Senators from that State voted for keeping a tariff on lumber and the other voted to take it off, and both represented what he believed was the best interest of his State and voted according to what he believed was a loyal expression of his view as a member of the Democratic Party.

I remember that when we came over into the State of Mississippi, the very able and distinguished senior Senator from that State [Mr. MONEY] declared in favor of the tariff upon lumber as a tariff for revenue. His position was that it was an article of commerce and that it ought to pay its share of the revenue; that it was a mere detail and that it ought not to be specifically mentioned in the party-platform matter, which he maintained should declare general party principles without committing itself to details.

I remember also that when we were making up that tariff something of a contest arose between the Senators from Florida and the Senators from Maryland. The Senators from Florida wanted the tariff on pineapples increased quite materially, because they said that Cuba had the advantage over Florida in the raising of pineapples; that their season was earlier, and they could get their fruit on the market sooner; there was an advantage in favor of the Cubans in the labor cost, and they said unless the tariff was increased upon pineapples they could not compete with Cuba; so they asked for an increase of the tariff, as I recall it, of over 100 per cent.

Immediately there was a very sharp difference of opinion between the Senators from Florida and the Senators from Maryland in regard to the tariff on pineapples. Maryland, it would seem from the speeches at that time, cans pineapples in large quantities, and wants to get them from Cuba without any tariff. So we had here a difference of opinion between our good friends from Florida, who wanted the tariff on pineapples increased, and our good friends from Maryland, who wanted it taken off entirely. That was all right; it was consistent enough; but it showed that as representatives of their respective States these able and distinguished and honorable Senators were doing the best they could, in a give-and-take policy, to represent their constituents in establishing schedules that would be as fair under the circumstances as could be secured.

The situation was very similar in many other things. The Senators from Colorado and Idaho wanted the tariff upon lead ores increased. The Senators from the Northwestern States wanted the tariff retained upon lumber and upon shingles. The distinguished Senators from California wanted an increase on lemons. By great ability and diplomacy and most excellent management they succeeded in securing what they wanted; but then I am told the Union Pacific Railroad Co. increased the transportation charge on lemons by just the amount which they succeeded in having the tariff upon lemons increased, and they lost the benefit of it.

So I discovered, Mr. President, that under the old method of making tariffs it was a sort of a grab game, in which each community was seeking to get all that it could out of it and to make the best bargain with its neighbors that was possible, and that the result was not satisfactory. The result under such circumstances could not be expected to be satisfactory.

I discovered that this old method of making a tariff was the same which had been followed in making tariff laws for generations, and that in the absence of some better way each Senator considered himself as a trade ambassador to represent his State in driving the best bargain for its people that he could drive.

The State I represent in part was no exception. Our people had some sheep out on its western ranges. They were producing wool, and they thought the tariff should remain on that commodity. The legislature that sent me to that extra session passed a resolution through both houses almost unanimously protesting against the reduction of the tariff on wool—the very legislature that gave me my commission made that sort of a declaration. I could not escape from it, no matter if I thought the tariff on wool ought to be reduced. The people to whom I was indebted for my commission and who sent me here expressed their wish in regard to it, and I felt bound by their instructions and voted against changes in the woolen schedule. This shows the condition of things under the old method of making a tariff. Selfishness, local interests, rise above every other consideration and it was a sort of grab-bag method. The East was trying to get all it could get.

Mr. GALLINGER. And it did.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And it did. The West was doing the best it could; and it did. California did magnificent work, but got cheated out of it afterwards. The Pacific States certainly put up a magnificent fight to retain the tariff on lumber. Our southern brethren wanted free cotton bagging; and I always thought they ought to have it; but they did not get it, though they got free sulphate of ammonia.

A TARIFF COMMISSION.

I do not believe in this reciprocity pact which my friend, for whom I have very great admiration, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], advocates, because I think it is a one-sided affair; but, Mr. President, I do believe in a tariff commission. If President Taft were to call this Sixty-first Congress back into an extraordinary session again, and we should go out as we went out in 1909 to revise the tariff, and should proceed according to the old method of revising, with no testimony, everyone acting for his locality, by the old grab-bag process, I do not believe, after the severe drubbing we have received, after the lesson which experience has taught us, if we should follow the old method that we could make any better tariff bill again than the Payne tariff law of 1909. I think we would get about the same result if we went at it in the old way, because we have no testimony. We were told that over in the other House the Committee on Ways and Means sat for a number of months and took a lot of testimony, but what was it worth? Who gave that testimony? What kind of people gave it? On one side the importer, who is dealing in imported articles and wanted to get the tariff off entirely. He testified in his own interest, and his wish was to cut it as low as he could possibly cut it. He was an interested party. On the other side was the manufacturer, who wanted to make money in a protected market and wanted to shut out foreign competition, so that he might personally profit by its exclusion. He testified in opposition to the importer and allowed his imagination to carry him to any extent which he thought was necessary to maintain his theory. The testimony came from men governed by the same motives—testimony ex parte, hearsay, and prompted by supreme selfishness. Such testimony is not worth a pinch of snuff. I would not give a penny for a bushel of it.

I remember one day we were working upon the tariff schedules, when all at once a sharp debate arose as to whether the tariff should be increased or reduced on quebracho. I said to myself, "What is quebracho?"

It was a new word to me. I had never heard of it. Whether it was a mineral or a tanning extract I did not know. None of it is produced in my State. I discovered, however, that the two Senators from Virginia were very much in favor of keeping the tariff on quebracho, while the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin wanted it materially reduced. I found out in a little while that it was a tanning extract. I think they get it down in South America somewhere, and the tanners wanted the tariff on it removed. But an equivalent or a substitute for it is made out of chestnut bark from the chestnut trees they grow in the Allegheny and Blue Ridge Mountains, and men in the mountains are earning a living for their families by stripping and selling this chestnut bark for an extract which comes into competition with quebracho. So the Senators representing the Appalachian region were insistent that the tariff should be kept and even increased on quebracho, while the States where great tanneries exist wanted quebracho to come in free.

There you are—a conflict of interest and no testimony. There was absolutely no testimony from which I could ascertain how much less it costs to produce this tanning extract called quebracho than it does to produce the extract from the chestnut bark. I knew nothing as to what the difference is in labor cost, or in transportation or in production. Did anybody else know? Mighty few. Almost everybody was situated just as I was. What could you do with it but make a guess—a guess in the dark, a guess without testimony? It was just so with reference to one item after another. We had no testimony.

Mr. President, my contention is that the only way out of this tariff wilderness is for us—and we would like to preserve some protection for our home market place—to have an efficient and nonpartisan tariff board or commission, with power to investigate each item of the tariff, to put people under oath if necessary; make them produce their books and papers, get to the facts, report the facts to Congress, and make up a book after the style of the Pharmacopœia, which the druggist uses, which will enable us, when an article like quebracho is being considered, to turn over its leaves and find the name of the article and ascertain from experts who have investigated the subject where it is produced, how much it costs to produce it, what is its substitute in the United States, how much it costs to produce that, what the difference is, and what is a reasonable margin to protect our home market.

Reliable and ready information like that furnished when the next revision is made will enable us to vote intelligently in fixing a duty on quebracho and all other articles.

I am in favor of a tariff commission, and we ought to pass the bill now before the Senate; take this bill and put it through here to-night.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us pass the Lorimer resolution first.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Put them both through if you want to and if you have the votes. I do not know whether you have the votes. I will not vote for your Lorimer resolution, but let us put the tariff commission through. I am satisfied the American people want it.

Some try to make out that the result of the last election was a Democratic victory. I do not believe that, because it was simply due to the dissatisfaction of Republicans over the tariff; yet they believe in protecting our home market. I want to see the tariff-commission bill go through. It will make our party stronger than ever. It will put us on a sounder basis than we have ever been upon before. I wish the Senator from Indiana, instead of chasing after this will o' the wisp, Canadian reciprocity, would remain true and steadfast to his first love and stand by the tariff-commission proposition.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to relieve the anxiety of my friend from South Dakota. My being in favor of Canadian reciprocity did not make me abate one iota of the passion I have for the tariff commission, to which I am willing to give all my strength and every effort I can. I should like to see it passed this morning, and would fight to do so.

RECIPROCITY.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I take no stock in this sort of false god they are putting up here for us to worship, called reciprocity, when it is not reciprocity. I think that it is really the worst and most one-sided and unfair proposition that has ever been presented to our people. I will tell you why.

The American farmer is not yet an extinct specimen of the human race. The American farmer is a positive force in the life of this Nation. Every farm home in the woodlands or on the prairies is a recruiting station that is furnishing blood and strength and sinew for all the walks of life and maintaining that stability which is absolutely necessary to keep alive the civilization that we enjoy.

The American farmer raises wheat out in the Northwest. They say that the tariff on wheat does not amount to anything, because we export wheat. It amounts to something in that zone along the border, greater or less in area; it amounts to a great deal there and always has; and we are just approaching a period when it will amount to something all over the United States; and then here comes a proposition to do what? Put it on the free list. For what purpose, pray tell me? They say to make bread cheaper. They keep the tariff on flour, and bread is made out of flour. They take the tariff off of wheat. Who is that going to help? It will not make your loaf of bread a particle cheaper, but it will help the millers over in Minneapolis, in Buffalo, and in the cities along the border, because they will get wheat from Ontario and Winnipeg and Assiniboine and Saskatchewan and British Columbia, and Mr. Hill, with his Great Northern Railroad, will haul it and get the profit out of hauling it, and the millers will grind it. But the Canadian flour can not get in at all. That is a one-sided affair; that is not in the interest of cheaper living at all; it is in the interest of your Millers' Trust and in the interest of your railroads.

Look at this reciprocity schedule, and you will find that biscuits and crackers, sweetened and unsweetened, are on the protected list—articles that are made out of this flour, are secondary products or third-stage products, or whatever they may be. They are on the protected list. The things that your hungry people, your poor people, must buy in these congested centers that are protesting against the high cost of living are put on the protected list. The tariff remains upon their biscuits and their crackers, and yet it is taken off the wheat for the millers. That is not fair.

Take breakfast foods—oatmeal, Cornflakes, Force, Grape Nuts—if there is a monopoly in the United States, it is the monopoly which has control over those breakfast foods which are sold in packages. The manufacture of them is controlled, and a trust dictates the price to the retailer, below which he does not dare to sell, for if he does they take the trade in them away from him.

That is the poor man's food—those breakfast foods—oatmeal and Cornflakes and Force and Grape Nuts. It is the poor man's breakfast, and yet it is left on the protected list, while wheat is put on the free list. Can anyone explain to me why any such a one-sided bill was negotiated; why these people who make Cornflakes and oatmeal and Force and Grape Nuts that the poor man has on his breakfast table should be protected while the wheat and oats that are turned into the flour out of which these articles are manufactured is to come in from Canada free and go into competition with the American farmer? I will not stand for a one-sided bill like that.

There is no justification for it. It can not be successfully defended. It is unfair. Oh, but they say, and no one says it better, more eloquently, than my friend from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], "We must look at it in a larger relation; we must look at it as the great cementing influence between two nations that speak the same language and as opening up a field for the enlargement of our trade." That is fine talk to indulge in when you are trying to make the American farmer think you have not swindled him, but it is an argument that is never made when they are raising the tariff upon the articles of the manufacturer. They do not indulge in these fine sentiments about extending American trade.

I think it is an absolutely unfair, one-sided proposition, and it is not going to promote this extension of trade and good feeling between our Canadian brethren on the north to make the American farmer absolutely resentful in his heart against a proposal like this.

The other day I had a letter from an old farmer up in my State. In fact, Mr. President, since this so-called reciprocity trade compact has been negotiated I have received letters from a class of my constituents that I never had heard from before. They have not been in the habit of writing letters to Congressmen and Senators. They are not politicians. They do not care who is postmaster or register and receiver of a land office. They are not interested in that. During all the time we were framing up the Payne tariff law these men sent no letters here, but I tell you, Mr. President, that when this Canadian trade pact was put through these men began to write letters. One sturdy old farmer in one of the northern counties in my State wrote me and said, "Who got up this trade pact? Was it an immigration society out in western Canada?"

It seems to me it must have been, because there is one thing dead sure. It will promote emigration into western Canada. It will increase the price of lands in western Canada and it will depress the value of my land and the lands of these pioneers out on the South Dakota prairies, and I do not think it is fair to the men who have opened up this Commonwealth and toiled and sacrificed and made it a success to now depress their values and establish an immigration bureau for western Canada.

Oh, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] made a most stanch and patriotic defense of our great Republican President the other day by saying this was the finest act he ever did. I admire the President and am very fond of him, and I think this is the only real mistake he has made. It is not fair. You let the cattle come in from all over this north country, trooping down across the lines free, and yet these packing products of all kinds are on your protected list. That is not fair. Who gets the benefit of it? The Packers' Trust, the Meat Trust, the Millers' Trust, the Breakfast-food Trust, the Lumber Trust, and the railroads, and the farmer gets the worst of it. The consumer receives no benefit from it. That is my opinion of this trade compact with Canada.

Talk about lumber. We would like to have free lumber in South Dakota. What does this give us? It puts rough boards on the free list. Who buys rough boards? The farmers do not buy them. They buy finished lumber. They buy lumber planed not simply on one side, but on both sides, and grooved, and scantlings and studdings. They are planed or finished. They do not buy rough boards. Who will use rough boards? If any one will use them it will be the mills on this side of the line. They will get the rough boards across the line and finish them. Then the Lumber Trust will sell them to our farmers. Who gets the benefit of this kind of free lumber? It is a fake! The American farmer will not get any benefit, and I do not believe in it. It is a one-sided arrangement. It is not fair or just to the American farmer and it will bring no relief to the man who is complaining about the high cost of living. It may aid the trusts who want to extend their trade and commerce.

They do not even put agricultural implements on the free list. I have offered an amendment, in which I have proposed to put everything that comes in from Canada that is mentioned in the trade compact on the free list. Will you Democrats vote for that? That is fair. If we are going to put the farmers' products on the free list, Canada is not going to complain if we put all the other articles named in the pact that come in from Canada on the free list. Let them send in plows and harrows and agricultural implements from Canada free.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Did not Canada complain?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not understand so. Is it not fair to let these things come in here free? Why not have full reciprocity with Canada? I am inclined to think that would be a good thing. At any rate it is wholly unjustifiable to give us this one-sided, unjust pact, in which our farmers are subjected to competition from the farmers in Ontario, and Saskatchewan, and Winnipeg, and Manitoba, and Alberta.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRIGGS in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am sure the Senator from South Dakota wants to be fair, and I have been informed by pretty good authority that those who formed this compact wanted to put all the secondary articles, such as meat and flour, and so forth, on the free list—the manufactured as well as the raw material—and Canada balked at it. Now, he says he thinks it would be a pretty good thing to have them all on the free list. I think our commissioners offered to put them on the free list and Canada balked.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not think Canada objected to having the United States Government remove the tariff on products coming in from Canada to us, but she would not abate the tariff upon articles going from the United States into Canada. We do not ask that. Let us take it off on this side of the line.

You certainly can do that here. If it results, under the favored-nation clause, in having these agricultural implements come in free from all nations, will the Senator from South Carolina complain?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No.

Mr. CRAWFORD. No; certainly not. But if they are going to discriminate against the American farmer and make him go into the protected market to buy his plows, his harrows, his hay rakes, his reapers, and his mowing machines, and everything of the manufactured kind that he has to buy and put everying that he raises and puts on the market on the free list, I will advocate putting these imports from Canada which the farmer uses on the free list.

Mr. GALLINGER. I take the liberty of inquiring of the Senator how much longer he thinks it will take him to complete this interesting speech, which in the beginning he thought he could deliver in 15 minutes?

Mr. CRAWFORD. What time does the Senator from New Hampshire usually get his breakfast?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am thinking of it now.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This early?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is pretty early for breakfast.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the Senator from South Dakota that there is a special order for to-day immediately after the Journal is read.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senate should continue in session it would not be possible to execute that special order. I do not myself desire that that shall be interfered with, and if the Senator from South Dakota has no objection, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CRAWFORD. When am I going to have an opportunity to conclude my remarks?

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator wants to conclude them, I certainly shall not make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator would have that opportunity after we vote on the special order if he got the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. If he wants to go on——

Mr. BULKELEY. Let him go on.

Mr. BAILEY. I withdraw the motion, and the Senate will stay here after 12 o'clock.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Until after 12 o'clock?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota has the floor.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not understand what negotiations are going on. I have been confined to the floor.

Mr. KEAN. Regular order!

Mr. CRAWFORD. But I want to——

Mr. BULKELEY. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota has the floor.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I insist that the Senator shall complete his address now.

Mr. CRAWFORD. All right.

Mr. President, in reference to barley. Here is barley malt made over in Canada, brought into this country with a duty of 45 cents on every hundred pounds. Barley malt is protected but the barley of the farmers in North and South Dakota and Minnesota and Wisconsin is put on the free list. Can anybody tell me why? Why not bring the barley malt in free?

Oh, they say that it is not fair; that we are asking protection in the Dakotas against New York. Well, have we not a right to something out of this protection business? If we have not, let us do away with it. Here are these hardy pioneers, who went out among the blizzards, upon those prairies, and struggled with bunch grass, breaking up the tough sod, living in sod houses, and plowing up a few acres each year and planting out their little crop of flax and taxing themselves to build schoolhouses and pay teachers' salaries and educate their children in the country schools, and I have seen them during the last 30 years in the Dakotas build magnificent States; they have done it and they have done it in the States all around us.

One of our most important crops in North Dakota and in a large number of counties in South Dakota is barley. We raise it. The Minneapolis brewers buy it. The Milwaukee brewers buy it. The Buffalo brewers have to buy it because there is a tariff upon the barley that comes in from the other side of the Niagara River, and they have to buy our barley. They tried two years ago to have the tariff taken off of it so that they could buy their barley from Ontario farmers. They did not succeed.

Now, they want this 30 cents a bushel taken off, and then your brewers and maltsters in Buffalo and in Rochester and in the other cities of western New York will buy their barley from the farmers in Canada because they are nearer the barley fields of Ontario, and they will not buy the barley from Dakota farmers.

They have a right to continue in the business and not be subjected to this competition just as much as these factories, these paper mills, these woolen mills, these cotton mills. All the manufacturers on this side of the line are claiming protection for the purpose of paying better wages, and all that sort of thing, and they are going to have it. Now, they take the tariff off from barley to help these brewers, and they leave it on barley malt because they do not want that product to come from Canada over here to compete with them. So you have your brewer trust, your lumber trust, your packers' trust, your breakfast-food trust, your millers' trust, and your railroad interest that wants to haul these cereals. You have got them all into a combination here to do what? To enrich themselves at the expense of the American farmer and give the benefit to them, but not to reduce the prices one single penny to the American farmer on the things which he must buy.

I say I have here letters from my constituents, men who have not been in the habit of writing upon this subject before. Here is one from Mr. G. B. Walters, a farmer at Selby, S. Dak.

He goes on to say that he wonders if an immigration bureau in western Canada did not propose this trade agreement.

Another letter is from W. R. Eastman, of Chamberlain, in my State, who says:

> I am opposed to the Canadian reciprocity treaty. It does not deal fairly by all classes.

Here is another from a farmer in my State, Mr. H. P. Walsh, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak., who says:

> In regard to the treaty with Canada I think it is very bad for the farmers. In Mr. Hill's speech in Chicago he says that the treaty with Canada would not and could not affect the price of wheat, as we have to compete with the markets of the world. Mr. Hill—does he forget the speeches that he has been making for the last two years, where he says that the farmers of the Northwest would have to improve their method of farming, or they would not be able to feed the people of the United States at the rate they are increasing? In other words, just at the moment that the farmers of the United States could derive some benefit from the existing tariff Mr. Taft would have it removed. This would be an insult to the farmers; still, would make Mr. Hill millions could the tariff be removed by hauling Canadian wheat into Minneapolis.

Now, that is a good honest farmer who is living next to the soil, who has opened up his farm and is raising crops upon it. Men like that are entitled to consideration when we are proposing, at the suggestion of Mr. Hill, to take the tariff off of his product and put him in competition with the farmers of Canada.

Here is another. This is from Hamburg, S. Dak., February 9, addressed to me:

> Allow us to make this statement in regard to proposed reciprocity: Seemingly we all like to be protected, though only our own production. The other party's industry may see how it comes along. High living prices without doubt point to speculative manipulation in farm products, as far as they are concerned. Our wheat and barley products, which are marketed two-thirds to three-fourths in September to November around 50 cents and 70 cents, later in the season when on the other side of the mill and big elevator, get well up, but have passed the producer. Beef sold in cities averaging twelve and fifteen is sold by the producer here at two and a half and three and a half. Pork is up until we have a new supply. Butter and eggs product down one-half. Reason evident. While labor, tax, mode of production, supplies keep fairly pace with principle of protection, though for the sake of that principle we are asked to let our protection drop.
> Now, is there anything in the line of tariff protection from the soft warm wool to the hard cold steel that the farmer, living as he does in this latitude, could get along without and so shirk his end of the burden?
>
> And now only one season with only local drought has swept these States, and another more general, and where is our imaginary prosperity? To reason, luxury and exaggerated high fly are poor signs of prosperity. Deterioration by either crop failure or legislation for this country spells exodus, impetus to the city and to Canada.
>
> Yours, truly, JOHN MOSS.

That is a good substantial farmer, a Scandinavian, a respected citizen in my State.

Here is another, a friend of mine, an actual farmer, Mr. Edward F. Beganeika. He says:

> I come to you in an humble way and ask you to try and put your power against the reciprocity treaty between the United States and Canada, for it would fail to do any good to the farmers of the Northwest.

That is all about that. The rest of the letter is about something else.

Here is another from Mr. N. H. Kent, a farmer in my State, who says to me:

> How do you like the President's position on Canadian reciprocity bill? He thinks all cereals should be admitted free of duty, but holds that manufactures should have duty about as high as they now enjoy. I suppose he is influenced somewhat, because his own State is more interested in manufactories than it is in agriculture. If it is good to help the Canadian farmer by admitting his wheat and other products free of duty, why not give their manufacturers the same good?
>
> The motive back of the whole thing is the interest of our manufacturers. They want cheaper food for their labor and conclude the way to get it is to admit Canada's agricultural products free. It is shown by a careful investigation of the cost of production that the average price of wheat is not equal to the cost of producing it.
>
> Now, on this showing is it right or just to force the American farmer to a lower price? Again, see what an impetus the additional price would be to the Canadians. Their wheat lands are very much cheaper than ours are. Hence the very material difference in the cost of production to them. There may come a time in the distant future when the difference in the cost of production will not be so great as now. It will then be soon enough to come to their rescue by lowering the duties on their cereals.
> This notion of sympathy—

Will the Senator from Indiana take notice of this? It is a farmer writing this letter—

> This notion of sympathy that the manufacturers are trying to work up as between the two countries is all nonsense.

This is a plain substantial honest tiller of the soil, who has opened up his home and is living upon his farm and raising products, and he says it is nonsense.

These farmers of the Northwest who are writing in their simple, honest, homely fashion here protesting against this trade compact, which means so much to them, have a right to be heard; and in their way they can state it as effectively and as eloquently as it can possibly be presented, and I am going to give them a hearing. This old friend of mine says:

> This notion of sympathy that the manufacturers are trying to make up as between the two countries is all nonsense. We have our own interests to care for just as Canada has, and let us see that they are cared for. We have succeeded as a Nation by keeping up our own interests and letting other people do the same. Why not continue in the good work? The farmers are not ready to take the duty off their products yet.
> Why should they not be permited to choose the time of the removal of the duty and not permit the manufacturers to choose for them? Treat all interests alike.
> Yours, N. H. KENT.

Mr. President, I shall have something further to say upon the subject of reciprocity and in behalf of these farmers, and in connection with this resolution possibly, but I understand that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] desires to be heard, and as the Senate has patiently indulged me for several hours I will yield the floor to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I have refrained from any extensive discussion of this case because it has been very elaborately and ably discussed; but it seems that further discussion has become necessary.

I was very much interested in the address of the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], but I noticed that there were some of the witnesses upon whose testimony he did not elaborately comment. That being the case, I feel that since I am to discuss it I possibly should take up the part of the evidence which it seems to me he has not dealt with as extensively as he might.

I will begin with commenting upon the testimony of Mr. White, and in order that the Senate may understand the full nature of it I shall read extracts from it and comment on the extracts. White has been depicted here as a very bad man. The character of White seems to be one subject in this controversy upon which there is no difference of opinion. He has not found any defender, and all have universally condemned him. His defense has been lacking; his evidence has been questioned and declared worthless by some Senators who have discussed the subject; others have pronounced it as strong and conclusive, because of the corroborating evidence which supports it. Since he was the leading witness, it seems to me White's testimony should be incorporated, or at least a large part of it should be incorporated, in the record. Mr. Austrian seemed to be an attorney who represented the Chicago Tribune, and was a very important factor in this case; indeed, I think more important than he should have been. Without desiring in any way to criticize any members of the committee, I would differ with them somewhat as to the methods of investigation that I should have favored had I been a member of the committee. I would not presume to say that the methods which I would have suggested or endeavored to have followed would have been better, but they would have been more in harmony with my judgment; and since I am to discuss the case I feel that the Senate ought to have the benefit of my judgment, of little value as it may be.

Instead of Mr. Austrian having charge practically of this investigation, it seems to me that the committee should have utilized him to the best advantage that they could and taken a more aggressive part in seeking the evidence themselves. It seems to me that instead of depending upon the attorney for the Chicago Tribune, who was one of the agencies in securing information here, as much as they did, it would have contributed more to the satisfactory investigation of the case if the committee had itself followed up all of the leads, had taken charge of Mr. Austrian and directed him more, and left him to direct the committee less as to the character of the investigation.

Mr. White was sworn, and the first question put to him was this:

Q. Mr. White, will you state to the committee your name, age, residence, and occupation?—A. My name is Charles A. White; my residence O'Fallon, Ill.; my age is 29 years.

That was the first interesting thing to me that I observed in this testimony; that this man White, who has created such a furor in the politics of Illinois and of the Nation, should have been so young a man—but 29 years old. I expected from what I had heard of White before I had read the testimony that he was a man of mature years, but it seems he was young. That may account to some extent for his character. He came into this whirlpool of political corruption which seems to infest the Illinois Legislature at somewhat tender years, and as a result to have imbibed all the vices with which he came in contact, and he seems to have retained none of the virtues that he certainly must have had in his youth. So he starts out on this political career, which has been somewhat spectacular and not altogether commendable, at the age of 29.

Q. What is your business?—A. I am not occupied at anything at the present time.
Q. Are you a member of the Forty-sixth General Assembly of the State of Illinois?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. When were you elected?—A. November 3, 1908.
Q. Prior to your election what was your business?—A. I was conductor on the street railway—interurban railway.
Senator BURROWS. Speak a little louder, please.

That is another thing that attracted my attention. I would like if some member of the committee, if he can, would give me some information in regard to that feature of this testimony. Senators who have read it will observe that on almost every page of the testimony of every witness Senator BURROWS, or some other Senator who was on this committee, continually called upon the witness to speak louder.

Why was it, let me inquire of some member of the subcommittee—and I see that I am honored with the presence of one of them to-night—why was it that the committee had to continually urge the witness to speak louder?

Mr. BULKELEY. Their voices seemed to be lacking; that is all.

Mr. BRISTOW. That was a very interesting feature of this investigation, and I observe it was true all the way through. I wondered if it was the qualities of the voices of these witnesses or whether it was the acoustic properties of the building in which the investigation was held.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. BULKELEY. The Senator asks a question, and I will say to him that it was a very general habit of the witnesses that were questioned in the first place by the attorney to whom the Senator refers to address their remarks to the questioner rather than to the committee, and consequently they were often reminded by the chairman of the committee that it was desirable that they should speak a little louder, so that the committee could hear as well as the attorney.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, I can realize that it is quite important that the committee should hear the witnesses. I thought possibly that the habit that these men—not all of them—the witnesses against Mr. LORIMER and for Mr. LORIMER, were afflicted with the same undertone in their testimony——

Mr. BULKELEY. I do not think there was any witness for Mr. LORIMER introduced at all. I think they were all introduced, if I remember correctly, by Mr. Austrian.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; that may be true; but, in fact, there were a number of witnesses who were very decidedly for Mr. LORIMER in their testimony.

Mr. BULKELEY. Yes; the testimony might have been in his favor; that is very true.

Mr. BRISTOW. Their bent and tone and the character and nature of the testimony was such that it was clearly manifest that they were really Lorimer witnesses, although they may have been called by the Chicago Tribune's attorney.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas further yield?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, certainly.

Mr. BULKELEY. I would like to state, in connection with the first remarks of the Senator rather criticizing the committee for the course of their investigation and allowing this attorney to take so active a part in it, that this matter was called to the attention of the Senate by a memorial from the Voters' League, and, as I recollect, almost the first request before the committee was a request from the representatives of the Voters' League, who stated that they had no attorney, for the committee to allow Mr. Austrian to represent them. That is the way he happened to be conducting the investigation.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am very much obliged to the Senator, and am glad to have the information.

Mr. BULKELEY. I think the Senator will find that to be true if he will read the report of the committee in the early part of it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; I have read it.

Mr. BULKELEY. But the Senator neglected to state that, and rather represented that the committee did it.

Mr. BRISTOW. The beginning of this investigation, as I remember, was a statement of a gentleman by the name of Barnes, who, I think, through the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], filed in this Senate a very voluminous document. That was the origin of this investigation, and that is incorporated in the report, with some very extensive addresses from the attorneys as to what scope the investigation should take.

Mr. BULKELEY. I think the Senator will find, also, in the early part of the report a request of this same representative of the Voters' League that this attorney should be allowed to represent them as the original suggestor of this investigation.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is true. I remember that very distinctly.

Now, to get back to the matter of the frequent requests of the committee to witnesses to speak louder, I thought it possible that the habits of their lives had been such as caused them to speak in undertones. All of the conversations seemed to be in a low tone of voice, and that of itself is suspicious. From the very beginning of this volume there are suspicions that grow on a man's mind. The fact that the witnesses speak so low and indistinctly that they can not be heard and have to be continually urged to talk louder is significant.

Senator BURROWS. Speak a little louder, please.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Whereabouts?—A. At East St. Louis, Ill.; I was with the company that operated at East St. Louis.
Q. Any other occupation immediately prior to your election to the forty-sixth general assembly?—A. No, sir.
Q. Were you ever employed by the labor bodies to be at Springfield, Ill.?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Springfield is the place in Illinois where the legislature meets, is it not?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. What time did you spend in Springfield, Ill., and doing what?—A. I was there during the session of 1907; I was State legislative representative of the Street Electric Railway Employees of Illinois.
Q. After you had been elected, you were elected as a member of the house, were you not?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. There being two bodies, the house and the senate?—A. The house and the senate; yes.
Q. State to the committee how many members there are in the houses—how many in the senate.—A. One hundred and fifty-three members of the house and 51 in the senate.
Q. After you were elected as a member of the house, did you become acquainted with Lee O'Neil Browne?—A. Yes, sir.

If I remember aright, this is the first place that the name of Lee O'Neil Browne appears in the record, and since I will be required to discuss the record at some length it seems to me that it is necessary to explain just who Lee O'Neil Browne is, and to understand the relations between White and Lee O'Neil Browne. I will read on a little through the record, and it will probably disclose the matter more clearly than I could explain it:

Q. Who was Lee O'Neil Browne?—A. He was the minority leader in the forty-sixth general assembly of the house.

And since the Legislature of Illinois is Republican, Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne was the Democratic leader.

Q. On what side?—A. The Democratic side.
Q. Were you a Republican or a Democrat?—A. Democrat.
Q. What, if any, communication did you have with Lee O'Neil Browne immediately after or shortly after your election to the forty-sixth general assembly?—A. Well, there were a number of communications; the first one, I believe, was congratulating me upon my election and notifying me that he was a candidate for minority leader. I think that was the first one, if I am not mistaken.
Q. That was on or about the 7th of November, was it not, 1908?

That was a natural thing, was it not? Here was a Democratic member elect, and the first communication that he had with Lee O'Neil Browne was one conveying congratulations. That is not unusual. Senators here will remember, possibly from experience, that when there is a candidate nominated or elected in the legislative districts, the first communication that they receive from aspirants for legislative honors is a message of congratulation. The purpose of that, I infer, is to put the new member in pleasant and cordial relation by the letter.

If Mr. White was as bright a man as he ought to have been and as he must have been, he should have known when he received the first letter of congratulation that there was something else coming after it, and he should have been put on his guard in regard to Mr. Browne. If he had, it might have saved him a great deal of trouble and the United States Senate a great deal of time.

Q. What, if any, communication did you have with Lee O'Neil Browne immediately after or shortly after your election to the forty-sixth general assembly?—A. Well, there were a number of communications; the first one, I believe, was congratulating me upon my election.

Do you not think that that is a truthful statement? Do you not believe him when he says the first letter he received from Browne was a letter of congratulation, and the next:

And notifying me that he was a candidate for minority leader. I think that was the first one, if I am not mistaken.

Congratulations, and then he noticed that Browne was a candidate for minority leader. I believe that is the truth.

Q. That was on or about the 7th of November, was it not, 1908?—A. Yes, sir; if I remember correctly.

Q. When did the house convene in 1909? The forty-sixth general assembly, as you recall it?—A. On January 6.

Q. (Showing witness paper.) Will you look at the letter which I now hand you and tell me if that is the communication that you refer to?—A. This is one of them; yes, sir. I would not be positive about it being the first; I think it is though.

Mr. AUSTRIAN (handing letter to Judge Haney). I will show you these two at the same time.

Judge HANECY. What is this, anything except to show——

Mr. AUSTRIAN. To show his efforts to get his support for minority leader.

Judge HANECY. Nothing special in it.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. That is the same thing.

Judge HANECY. How are those material?

Mr. AUSTRIAN. It would show the relation of the parties.

Judge HANECY. Mr. Browne is not a party here.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. When I said the relation of the parties I referred to the relations of Mr. Browne, the man charged with having bribed this member of the legislature. I want to show the relations of the two members of the house, one a Democratic minority leader and the other a member of the house.

That was a very proper thing to show in the beginning.

Judge HANECY. They are both members of the house.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. We know that.

Judge HANECY. I didn't know, the way you stated it.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. One a Democratic minority leader and the other a member of the house.

Judge HANECY. I do not know what materiality there is in this, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. Simply to show the relations of the parties; that is all.

Now, of course, I am not competent to criticize these attorneys, but it seems to me that these two lawyers took up a good deal of space here and did not give much information. I have been reading this five minutes or more, narrating the efforts that these two distinguished lawyers were making to ascertain whether or not these two men were members of the Illinois Legislature, and all the way through this testimony you will observe that, day after day, these men put in a great deal of superfluous talk in their efforts to establish what everybody knew. That may be the legal method; it may be necessary to do that in order to conform to the legal requirements. But it seems to me the committee ought to have cut out that—to use a familiar phrase—to have required them to talk less at random and more to the point. Indeed, that is a suggestion which possibly the Senate itself might profit somewhat by and possibly will in the years to come.

Continue the testimony:

Mr. AUSTRIAN. Simply to show the relations of the parties, that is all.

Senator BURROWS. Between whom?

Mr. AUSTRIAN. Between Mr. Browne and Mr. White. The Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections have held that it is perfectly competent, that you can even show bribery in the caucus.

Judge HANECY. That is not the question I am raising. When you get to the bribery, that is another question. This is a lot of stuff which, I assume, does not show that nor tend to.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. It tends to show that this man was the minority leader, and the witness in the chair became one of his supporters at that time.

Judge HANECY. He says he was the minority leader; we will admit that, and we will admit that he was a candidate for that position. I have not read the letters, and do not know what is in them. One of them has 3 pages and the other 2 pages each.

I should like to know what was the use of that question. That is another one of those superfluous and useless questions that are injected in here which elicits no information.

Mr. BULKELEY. What was the question?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will read it again:

Judge HANECY. He says he was the minority leader; we will admit that, and we will admit that he was a candidate for that position. I have not read the letters, and do not know what is in them. One of them has 3 pages and the other 2 pages each.

Mr. BULKELEY. There was no question about that.

Mr. BRISTOW. No. I think that was merely a suggestion.

Mr. BULKELEY. That is all.

Mr. BRISTOW. I guess that is right.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. They simply show the solicitation of the witness, White, to support him in his minority leadership candidacy.

Now, you know we have been going through a page, and this is the conclusion of all this stuff, which was clearly manifest in the very first answer of White, that he received these letters. One was a congratulation, followed by solicitation for his support.

Senator BURROWS. Mr. Austrian, the witness has already stated that Mr. Browne was the minority leader. These communications shed no additional light on it.

I think that is a very just rebuke of these lawyers who indulged in a great deal of superfluous talk, and I want to congratulate the committee, because in the reading of this testimony I may not have a great many occasions to congratulate them, and I want to do so when opportunity affords, and I want to commend the chairman of the committee for his efforts to suppress as much of this superfluous conversation as he possibly could.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. I will let the witness state the fact in lieu of the letters if you desire, but counsel may object because it is expressed in the letters.

Judge HANECY. I will admit that Mr. White did not know Mr. Browne, and that Mr. Browne did not know Mr. White, until they were elected to that session of the legislature.

If I remember rightly, he made an admission there that was not justified, for this evidence as it is followed up as I remember does show that they were acquainted, that they had met in the former legislature when White was there as a representative of the labor organization. So that Mr. Hanecy in this case admitted something that was not correct.

Q. Were you solicited by Mr. Browne to support him for minority leader of the house as early as November, 1908?—A. I think I was; yes, sir.

We knew that at the beginning.

Q. Did you have frequent or a number of meetings with Mr. Browne, together with other Democratic members of the house, looking to his election as minority leader?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In or about the month of January, 1909?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you one of his supporters in that election?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Or candidacy?—A. Yes, sir.

I can not understand the use of that question, either.

Q. Did you at any time have any talk with Lee O'Neil Browne, the same Browne I heretofore referred to, with reference to voting for WILLIAM LORIMER for the United States Senator?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When did you have the first talk?—A. On the night of May 24, 1909.

Senator BURROWS. Witness, it is utterly impossible to hear anything you say.

There it is again.

The WITNESS. On the night of May 24, 1909.

Q. Whereabouts?—A. In his room in the St. Nicholas Hotel, Springfield, Ill.

Q. Had you been at Springfield and had Mr. Browne been at Springfield since the opening of that session the greater portion of the time?—A. Yes, sir; on legislative days.

Q. During the days they voted for United States Senator?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who was the Democratic candidate for United States Senator?—A. Lawrence B. Stringer.

Q. Prior to your talk with Browne had you or Browne voted for a Republican for United States Senator?—A. I had not; no, sir.

Q. Had Browne, so far as you know?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. You say you had a talk with Mr. Browne on the night of the 25th of May?—A. On the night of the 24th of May.

Q. Where and at what time?—A. Well, I couldn't state exactly the time when——

Q. (interrupting). Approximately, in the evening, or night, or in the morning?—A. It was in the night, possibly between 10 and 2; I couldn't state exactly what time.

Q. Between your first acquaintance with Mr. Browne, in November or December, 1908, and this May 24, 1909, had you become well acquainted with Mr. Browne?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had you seen him both in and out of the House a great deal?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you tell the committee, if you please, what conversation you had with Mr. Browne on this night of May 24, 1909?—A. Mr. Browne asked me if I could vote for a Republican, and I told him that I could. He asked me if I could vote for Mr. LORIMER, and I told him that I could. He told me that was strictly "under my hat;" to say nothing to anyone about it. I told him all right; I would keep it quiet. I asked Mr. Browne if certain other members were going to vote for him, and he said some would and some would not. Mr. Browne told me he wanted me to keep it strictly "under my hat." He said it would not be any chicken feed, either. That is about the substance of the conversation that night; that is about the substance of the conversation. There might have been something more he said.

That to my mind has evidences of truth in it, because it is the natural form of expression which men of the habits and life of White would use—"keep it under his hat." That is the language of men of his character, and that it would not be chicken feed—that is, would not be any small stuff.

Q. The general assembly had been voting in joint sessions for United States Senator since January 19 or 20, 1909, hadn't they?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you asked him whether or not certain Democrat members were going to vote for LORIMER, did you call off the names of the members of the house, or some of the names of the members of the house?—A. I did.

Q. Will you state to the committee what names you called off and what reply Mr. Browne made to your inquiry?—A. I don't know that I can call them all off now exactly, but I remember asking him about some members. The minority was split into two factions at that time, known as the Tibbitt faction and the Browne faction.

I have often wondered, in reading and thinking about this testimony, if the Tibbitt faction was as rotten as the Browne faction, and how many of the votes of the Tibbitt faction did Mr. LORIMER secure? Were any of these alleged bribe votes members of the Tibbitt faction? As I remember, there is no evidence which shows that any financial dealings were had with Tibbitt. But it seems that Browne gathered under his wing the corrupt element of the Democratic side of the legislature, and—possibly I may be mistaken in this—these men who rather revolted against such a leadership as Browne's were attached to the other faction.

Q. Will you state to the committee what names you called off and what reply Mr. Browne made to your inquiry?—A. I don't know that I can call them all off now exactly, but I remember asking him about some members. The minority was split into two factions at that time, known as the Tibbitt faction and the Browne faction.

Q. They were both Democratic factions?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You called off the names of some members and to some he answered "Yes" and to others "No?"—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any subsequent talk with him, prior to the time of the election of Mr. LORIMER, on the 26th?—A. I had a talk with him on the afternoon of May 25.

Q. Mr. LORIMER was elected May 26?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What talk did you have with Mr. Browne on May 25, 1909?—A. I went to his room and asked him—he requested me to come to his room before I went there, and I had sent word—I didn't send word, I spoke to Mr. Giblin, his stenographer, and asked Mr. Giblin what there was in it, and he told me it looked pretty good to him, and he went to Mr. Browne——

Judge HANECY. I object to the conversation with somebody else in relation to this.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. This is not important, this particular conversation. I will withdraw it.

Now, I should like to know what good it does to withdraw it when you still leave it in the book. If all of this testimony that was decided to be useless and which permission was asked to withdraw had been withdrawn, our labors would have been greatly reduced, because the volume would not have been more than two-thirds as large as it is.

So, when he asked to withdraw it, it seems to me that he ought to have done as we do here in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—cut it out. But here it is, withdrawn, but not withdrawn, and the reading of this testimony and the studying of it gives one somewhat an insight into the trial of cases. A lawyer will ask a question, which is an improper question. The question attracts the minds of the jury to an idea. The opposing attorney objects, and it is immediately withdrawn. Through the laborious trial the minds of the jurors become somewhat confused, so that they do not discriminate between that which they have heard and that which they have been told not to believe, which is withdrawn, and that which they have heard they are expected to credit:

Judge HANECY. I ask that it be stricken from the record.

Senator BURROWS. It will go out of the record—what Mr. Giblin said.

Q. Mr. White, you remember of seeing Mr. Browne, do you?—A. Yes, sir.

The Senator said it would be cut out of the record, but it was not. It seems to me that this record ought to have been edited. For several minutes I have been reading a lot of stuff here that the chairman of the committee ordered cut out. It was not cut out. It is here. If I may be permitted, I will say that I think a great deal that was ordered cut out was material which ought not to have been cut out; so probably it is better for the illumination of the transactions that occurred at Springfield that this record was left as complete as it is, although it seems to have been contrary to the wishes and purposes of the chairman of the committee in many instances.

Q. Mr. White, you remember of seeing Mr. Browne, do you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where?—A. In his room.

Q. On May 25?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. This was the second talk on this subject you had with them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Mr. White, did you vote for Mr. LORIMER on May 25?

Senator BURROWS. Where was his room?—A. At the St. Nicholas Hotel in Springfield.

Q. The conversation was in the St. Nicholas Hotel at Springfield, was it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In Mr. Browne's room?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Mr. White, when did you first vote for Mr. LORIMER for United States Senator?—A. May 26, 1909.

Q. Was that the only time you ever did vote for Mr. LORIMER?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that was the time that Mr. LORIMER received 108 votes, was it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And was declared elected to the United States Senate? [No answer.]

Q. This talk with Mr. Browne on May 25, 1909—will you kindly detail to the committee what that talk was?—A. I asked Mr. Browne what I was to receive for voting for Mr. LORIMER; how much I was to get, and he replied by saying, "You are not afraid to trust that to me, are you, old boy?" I told him that I was not afraid to trust it to him, but I would like to know. He says, "You will get $1,000 and it is ready cash, too." He implored me to keep it quiet. He told me he was damned suspicious (I use his exact language) of a little place above called "Joliet."

Now I wonder what that was. That is one thing I could not understand in this testimony. What was the little place above called Joliet? I know there is a city in Illinois named Joliet; but how could Browne be suspicious of Joliet when he was at Springfield?

Mr. BULKELEY. The State penitentiary is there. That is the reason.

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, I do not blame Browne. I see now; he had that in mind. That is right. That is a good suggestion. It shows that these visions concerning which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] has been talking to us to-night were pursuing Mr. Browne even then when the negotiations were in progress. He wanted this kept under the hat. He was suspicious of "a little place above called Joliet." He did not want this information to get out, because it might land him in the penitentiary at Joliet. I see now. I am very much obliged to the Senator for the explanation.

I told him I would keep it quiet.

Now, that is one promise he kept for awhile, but he afterwards violated it.

He asked me to talk to no one about it. Then I asked him how much we were to get from the other source, and he says, "You will get about that much or a little more."

He overestimated how much the jack pot would bring in, because, if I remember the testimony aright, he got only about $900 out of the jack pot.

Judge HANECY. I object to that.

Of course, the judge would object to that, because that is very interesting and valuable testimony.

That will be the principal purpose of this prosecution to bring in other matters and slime this proceeding over with something that members of the legislature said in relation to other matters—a jack pot, etc., and I object to their going in and trying the other members of the legislature, or the members of the legislature generally, for misconduct in this proceeding.

I notice all through the testimony that Judge Hanecy tried to keep out of the record all testimony relating to the jack pot. It seemed that the evidence in regard to the jack pot was so conclusive that it could not be disputed, and the connection between the two funds, the jack-pot fund and the Lorimer fund, was so close that I can see the skill of the judge in his efforts to bar all evidence relating to the jack pot, because all through the testimony disclosed that; the one corroborated and supported the other. They were two pillars of an arch, both necessary to support the structure.

I ask the pardon of the Senate for reading so slowly, because I can not comment as I would like to do and make any more rapid progress. While it may take some time to get through the entire testimony, nevertheless I hope to make it as complete as possible, and where any of it appears to be somewhat uncertain or hazy to amplify it and make it plain.

That was the purpose.

Now Mr. Austrian, after Judge Hanecy's objection to this——

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. OWEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey	Crane	Kean	Simmons
Bankhead	Curtis	Lorimer	Smith, Md.
Borah	Dick	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	Dillingham	Martin	Smoot
Brandegee	Dixon	Nixon	Stephenson
Briggs	du Pont	Oliver	Stone
Bristow	Fletcher	Owen	Swanson
Bulkeley	Flint	Page	Taylor
Burkett	Gallinger	Paynter	Thornton
Burnham	Gamble	Penrose	Warner
Burrows	Guggenheim	Percy	Warren
Carter	Heyburn	Perkins	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Johnston	Piles	Young
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Shively

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. BRISTOW (reading):

Judge HANECY. The purpose is to put it before this committee and it has nothing to do with the Senatorship.

That is, information as to the jack pot.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. If I am permitted to state the purpose I will be pleased to——

Mr. FLINT. I hope the Senator from Kansas will have the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator from California desire to ask me a question?

Mr. FLINT. No; I suggested to have order so that we could hear the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will try to speak loud enough. My complaint of the disorder does not indicate that I had desired that any Senator should leave the room. I would very much prefer, of course, that they stay because I am reading the testimony.

I fear that a great many Senators, busy as they are with the crowding duties in the closing days of the short session, have not had an opportunity to read this testimony. I think that every Senator here ought to hear it if he has not read it before he casts his vote upon this most important question. So I voluntarily hope to relieve——

Mr. KEAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator says we ought to read the testimony or hear it read before we cast our votes. At what time would the Senator like to have us vote?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, I will leave that to the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator does not seem to want to give any one an opportunity to vote.

Mr. BRISTOW. But the Senator from New Jersey certainly does not want to vote before he has heard the testimony?

Mr. KEAN. But I have read the testimony.

Mr. BRISTOW. Has the Senator read it all?

Mr. KEAN. Yes; all.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think that it would be profitable to the Senator from New Jersey to hear it a second time.

Mr. KEAN. I shall listen to the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, in reading this testimony, I expect to illuminate some features of it. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will not feel that these efforts of mine are wholly in vain.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. If I am permitted to state the purpose, I will be pleased to. The evidence will disclose that there were certain Democratic members of the house and senate that entered into a combination in respect to this so-called bribery matter, that is the purpose of it. A senate committee held it was proper in the Clark case.

I wondered if there were any Republican members of that legislature who were bribed. As I remember the evidence, all of the members who are alleged to have been influenced in their votes by the promise of money were Democrats. I have wondered if there was any corruption as far as the senatorial election was concerned on the Republican side. It seems to me that the committee—and I do not want to offer this as a criticism, but merely as a suggestion—has failed in its duty in not undertaking to investigate the Republican members of the legislature with that degree of vigilance they seem to have exercised or that seems to have been exercised in bringing out the facts as to the Democratic members.

But that difficulty could not lie with this committee, because the committee was composed of both Democratic and Republican members. Still all the corruption seems to have been developed on the Democratic side, and I wonder if the Democratic members of the committee or the subcommittee were as vigilant as they should have been in the pursuit of the investigation of the members of the opposing party. However, be that as it may, I am digressing, and I think the testimony is more useful than these side observations.

Judge Hanecy must have been a great orator in a way, because he makes the longest speeches in arguing this question as to the purpose of bringing out information as to this jackpot fund. He said:

Judge HANECY. There is no system here, notwithstanding the remarks of brother Austrian about a "jack pot." I submit that it is unnecessary, because a man is charged with taking a bribe of a thousand dollars for voting for another man for United States Senator to prove that the man committed some other offense.

I disagree with him there, for if that man was accustomed to accepting bribes, if it clearly appeared that he did accept a bribe for some other cause or for some other purpose, would not any evidence tending to show that he had accepted a bribe for the purpose of influencing his vote for United States Senator—would not the fact that he had been bribed to vote on other things be material in enabling anyone to weigh the probability of his having accepted that money? So, I think, Judge Hanecy was wrong in that statement.

For instance, that he set fire to somebody's building or his own building for the purpose of defrauding some insurance company or committed murder or some other offense.

That is true, but they were not trying to show that this man had killed anybody or committed any murder. What they were endeavoring to do was to show that he had accepted bribes from the same men during the same time for other purposes as well as for voting for United States Senator.

If that is to be the rule here, then there can be no limit to it. It is not competent, and can not be, that the other matters had to do with the election of a United States Senator, as Mr. Austrian says, because some man got money for doing other things, and the system he says was so that they could get money for other things, and the other things have no relation whatever to the senatorship. The senate, as a whole, is a separate body created by the Congress of the United States under the Federal Constitution. It is not a legislature. They meet in a separate house, and they never meet in joint assembly except for the election of the United States Senator. That was determined in the Davidson and McCall case, where the question was gone into by the best lawyers in the Senate and in this country. Then the law in that question was tested in the matter of the governorship between Charles S. Deneen, Republican candidate, and Mr. Stevenson, the Democratic candidate, and the only body that could decide that contest for the governorship was the legislature, and that is the law. It is made the law by the Federal statute under the Federal Constitution, and there is no other law that can control it. There is not a word in the statutes of Illinois or in the State constitution about the election of United States Senator, and the only body that can elect is the joint assemblage created by the Federal statute of 1866.

It can not be contended that he did. When they meet in joint assembly the Federal statute provides that they must meet at 2 o'clock, meridian time, wherever it may be, fixing the time, and says that they must take at least one vote each legislative day until a Senator is elected.

They took one vote each day. On a few days they took more, but just as soon as they took that vote and adjourned the senate marched out of the joint assembly to their own room, and they separated and transacted business.

Now, I should like to know what that had to do with it? It seems to me that it had nothing whatever. What is this argument—here is a full page of it by this lawyer—instructing this committee of United States Senators how the legislature proceeds to elect United States Senators? Everyone of them was a Senator, and some of them had been for many years. They knew just how the election of a Senator takes place—the formalities that are observed—and still they let this fellow stand there and talk to them for 10 or 15 minutes about a matter that is wholly immaterial and of which they had absolute knowledge. I think I will leave it to the Senate if just criticism does not lodge against the committee for this waste of time, waste of printing matter, waste of public funds, waste of the time of the Senators who are compelled to read it. But listen to it.

They took one vote each day. On a few days they took more but just as soon as they took that vote and adjourned the senate marched out of the joint assembly to their own room, and they separated and transacted business. Now, will it be contended by anybody, much less a lawyer, that what the members of the house and the senate did in passing legislation in relation to Chicago, or Cairo, or Galena, or Waukegan, or some other place during the separate recesses can be grafted onto the proceedings in the general assembly and have the election of a United States Senator and the candidates before that joint assembly who were running for United States Senator charged with what they did? That is just what this means and it does not mean anything else.

Just think of that! I am not sure but here is another half page of this meaningless, pointless stuff incumbering this record.

Now, if we have got to be smirched by that, why then there is no safety for anybody. All they have to do is to say, "We are going to make charges against those men; the man who went to the legislature was a bad man; he divorced his wife, or he murdered his wife or his child or something else." Because that is competent to show what he did—I say, rather, that if that is competent to show what he did in the separate assembly rooms or the separate house, why, then, it is competent to show what he did at the Leland Hotel or to show a consultation that he had at home to show that he took bribes or did other offenses contrary to the criminal law.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, we have heard the testimony, or most of it at least, in the Lorimer case and we are more or less familiar with what has been said by all of the witnesses. Would it not be of more profit to the Senate if the Senator would read something with which we are not familiar, for instance, Elliott's Debates or the Old Testament or the New Testament or anything that the Senate has not before heard?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Oregon will provide me with a copy of the New Testament or a copy of the Old Testament, I shall be very glad to read him a chapter. I think it will be profitable to him, and I shall gladly comply with his request. I do not, however, happen to have with me a copy of the books referred to by the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I presume that the Presiding Officer can furnish the Senator with any of the books I have mentioned.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is very good. Not having the Bible or the Testament here, I think that I should, until they arrive at least, devote myself to the presentation of the evidence in the case that is now before the Senate. I know that the arguments of these attorneys are very uninteresting and of very little value, but if I omitted the arguments I would be accused of garbling the record, and that is an accusation that has been made against the committee. I do not want to fall into the same fault that the committee is accused of having fallen into.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I submit in perfect good faith, and without any disposition to be frivolous in the matter, that the reading of Elliott's Debates would be very much more interesting to the Senate than the reading of the testimony in this case that was taken in Chicago.

Mr. BRISTOW. Doubtless the reading of some of George Eliot's novels might be more interesting and might be more entertaining. Indeed, I might read the debates of the constitutional convention, but I am presenting to the Senate the evidence directly upon the case that is now under consideration, and I hope I shall not be criticized for reading the very evidence upon which the Senator must base his ultimate decision when he casts his vote upon this case. I appreciate very deeply indeed the kindly suggestions of the Senator, and I would be glad to comply with them if it were convenient, but I regret that it is not.

I do not want to miss any of this:

Because that is competent to show what he did—I say, rather, that if that is competent to show what he did in the separate assembly rooms or the separate house, why then it is competent to show what he did at the Leland Hotel or to show a consultation that he had at home, to show that he took bribes or did other offenses contrary to the criminal law, and that is what this proceeding is for at this time, and I submit nothing else; and therefore I say it should not come in here.

Senator HEYBURN—

This is the first time in this record that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has asked a question of the witness White. Further on in the testimony you will observe, as you follow my reading, that he became very active in the discharge of his duty as a member of the committee. I want to pay that compliment to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am very sorry to have my remarks interrupted by these continued roll calls, but I know of no way of avoiding it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey	Crane	McCumber	Smoot
Bankhead	Culberson	Martin	Stephenson
Brandegee	Curtis	Nixon	Stone
Briggs	du Pont	Oliver	Swanson
Bristow	Fletcher	Owen	Thornton
Brown	Flint	Page	Warner
Bulkeley	Gallinger	Paynter	Warren
Burkett	Gamble	Penrose	Watson
Burnham	Heyburn	Percy	Wetmore
Burrows	Johnston	Piles	Young
Carter	Jones	Shively
Chamberlain	Kean	Simmons
Clark, Wyo.	Lorimer	Smith, Md.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I want to say that, acting in the capacity of judges of one of the highest judicial tribunals in the United States, I feel that we ought to give Mr. LORIMER a vote on this question and determine whether or not he is entitled to a seat in the Senate. But I feel and realize that there are some concessions that ought to be made by his friends, and that the matters at issue between the men on both sides of this question in the Senate ought to be determined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Kansas has yielded to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am frank to say that I am opposed to the position which the friends of Mr. LORIMER take in the Senate, but yet I feel that, acting as judges, we ought to determine this question and vote for or against him. But whatever else is pending in the Senate, we ought to make some concession, and I think we ought to determine the matter right now.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, continuing, I am sorry to announce that a great deal of this testimony is taken up with a discussion of the attorneys, which is very dry and uninteresting. The evidence of the witnesses is somewhat different; indeed it was difficult for me, in reading the testimony the first time, to carefully read these long-winded discussions of the attorneys. I could not get much value out of them, but it was necessary to read them in order to understand fully the weight of the testimony that followed that was admitted or to understand the character of the testimony that was to be excluded.

I was starting in with the examination by Senator HEYBURN.

Senator HEYBURN. As I understand it, you urge no objection to that part of the question, that he was to receive a thousand dollars?

Mr. HANECY. I have no objection to that, Senator.

Senator HEYBURN. Well, now, suppose that in the same conversation——

Then he was interrupted by Judge Hanecy. I think the question that was to be propounded by Senator HEYBURN was a very pertinent and proper one. But he is interrupted by Hanecy, and there was a long discussion here that I think was very irritating; it certainly must have been.

Mr. HANECY. If in the same conversation he stated that the consideration he was to receive for his vote—in that conversation he stated he was to receive a certain additional sum or additional amount or percentage. Now, would that be equally a part of the consideration for his vote as the thousand dollars, Mr. Senator? If he says, or if this witness should swear here that it was agreed that he was to be paid a thousand dollars for voting for LORIMER and then was to get a cow or a horse in addition to that, that he was to get some other consideration for doing that thing—not something else—then it is competent here. But unless it is, then it is not competent here, I submit.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. I would just like to answer what counsel has said, if I may.

Now, Austrian comes in with a long argument.

Senator BURROWS. Certainly.

The Senator was very courteous to him.

Mr. AUSTRIAN—

Now, we have an address to the committee by the counsel for the Chicago Tribune.

Mr. AUSTRIAN. Counsel is mistaken in what the law is in this State, as well as in other States. What the law is has been held by the Senate committee of which Chairman BURROWS is a member. The purpose of it is, if you will permit me, Mr. Chairman—and I will not take nearly so long as opposing counsel did—the purpose of it is to show that in that legislative body that there was general corruption.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Kansas yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY (at 7.45 a. m., Tuesday, Feb. 28, 1911). Acting upon the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], to which I thoroughly assent, and which I think entirely wise and proper, I am going to ask the Senate to take a recess, if I can have unanimous consent, until half past 11 o'clock, and see if it is not possible to reach some basis of agreement upon which the Senate can proceed to dispose of the matter pending before it, and then proceed to dispose of other matters, so as at least not to render an extraordinary session of Congress absolutely necessary.

I ask the Chair to submit as a request for unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until 11.30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until 11.30 o'clock this morning.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will not Senators have plenty of time for any possible arrangement that we can make if we take the recess until 10 o'clock? We have not many more days left.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that half past 11 would give Senators but three hours in which to have breakfast, change our linen, and do such other things as are necessary. There are certain groups of Senators who desire to have some conferences, and I think if we were to come back at 11 or half past 10 we would probably find ourselves still not ready to dispose of the matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. If there is any hope of settling the matter that is in controversy and going on with the business of the Senate, of course it would be well for us to adjourn until to-morrow, if it could be done, and get through with this. I have not much hopes of our being able to secure it.

Mr. BAILEY. There is a special order fixed for to-day immediately after the reading of the Journal, if we reach that time, and I hope we will, without any doubt, and I feel that it would be time saved to take a recess until half past 11.

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall not object, if the Senator has any hopes of accomplishing anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. I notice the absence of the chairman of the committee. I think he should be here before unanimous consent is given.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that I have consulted—I did not see the chairman—with some other members of the committee, and those that I did happen to see——

Mr. HEYBURN. I say that merely because the chairman requested me to be on guard here, and he might feel that I was not representing him properly if action should be taken in his absence. I should want to know that he had personal knowledge of the proposed proceeding. Otherwise I should feel that I was neglecting a charge that he had requested me to look after.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that the chairman of the committee has not been personally consulted because it was not convenient to consult him. I was responding to the suggestion made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] only a moment ago; and in conference with some Senators on both sides who are interested that seemed to me to be about the best course.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, of course I feel that I am a new Member in the Senate as compared with some of the distinguished gentlemen who are here to-night, but it seems to me that what has been done here has been merely child's play. To be entirely frank with my distinguished friend, the Senator from Texas, and other friends, I want to say that I am in favor of unseating the gentleman who has been sent to this distinguished body from Illinois, but the condition precedent which has been imposed upon us of deciding that question and deciding the question as to the creating of a tariff board, which has been suggested by the distinguished Senator from Iowa, now confronts us. It seems to me, acting in the capacity of one of the judges on this important question, that the sitting Member is entitled to a vote on his case. He may be dismissed from this body, to which he claims to have been elected. It may be that he will be seated as a Member of this body; but whether that be true or not, it is the duty of the Senate, acting in the highest capacity of any body in this Union, to decide that question first, and then to determine the question whether or not we want a tariff board, as suggested by the President.

I believe, Mr. President, if we will dispose of the first question—whether Mr. LORIMER is entitled to a seat in this body—all else will follow in order, and tying it up with something else that ought not to be linked with the question as to his right to a seat in this body is mere nonsense.

I believe, with the Senator from Texas and others who have spoken here to-night, that if we will wipe out from the consideration of this body the question as to Mr. LORIMER's seat, all else will follow in order. I think we ought to determine that question as one of the highest deliberative bodies in the Union, and I hope the Senate will determine that question first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BULKELEY. In view of the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, I should like to ask the question, Suppose the Senate now takes a recess and reassembles at 10 or 11 o'clock and goes on with its proceedings, under some arrangement, on this legislative day, when 12 o'clock comes what becomes of the special order?

Mr. BAILEY. Of course, that is a parliamentary question which might be properly addressed to the Chair, but since the Senator from Connecticut does me the honor to ask me my opinion on it I say to him very frankly that I think that order would be displaced.

Mr. BULKELEY. That is my own view of it.

Mr. BAILEY. In other words, the order is for a vote immediately after the reading of the Journal. If this session of the Senate does not terminate before the next daily session should begin, there would be no Journal to read.

Mr. BULKELEY. That is my view of it.

Mr. BAILEY. But I hope we will not encounter that condition.

Mr. BULKELEY. I suggest the regular order. Let us go on with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest——

Mr. BAILEY. Of course, I could make a motion, but I did not want to do that. I rather felt as if there was irritation enough already. I do not want to beat anybody again unless it is absolutely necessary. I think we could take the recess without any trouble, but I should like to see it done unanimously.

I think, Mr. President, after what I have witnessed to-night that it will be a long time before I again engage in a filibuster. I am rather inclined to think it may be a useful lesson to me, and hereafter when my part of the debate is over I shall be ready to vote, and certainly when other Senators have concluded their real addresses I think I shall never obstruct unless it be in a matter involving the safety of my own constituents.

I hope there will be no objection now to the recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Displacement of the special order could be avoided by an adjournment after the Senate convenes after the recess.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that. That could be avoided if we meet at half past 11 and adjourn at 5 minutes to 12; that would save that. There is no question on that.

Mr. STONE. I concur in what the Senator from Oregon said as to the right of Mr. LORIMER to have a vote. I have not sought to prevent a vote being taken, and shall not. I agree with the Senator from Oregon that the question of agreeing upon a time to take that vote should not be coupled with any other controversy, so as to endanger an agreement as to the Lorimer case. I do not care to stand in the way of the progress of the Senate's business if I can avoid it.

I apprehend that the suggestion made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is predicated upon something that I had said to Senators as well as upon what the Senator from Oregon has said. I think it would be advisable to take the recess as suggested, that there might be some conferences among Senators as to the best course to take, out of the hope that those conferences might lead to some agreement by which the difficulties confronting us could be adjusted.

Nevertheless I think it due to say that I do not wish it understood by anything I have said that I have assumed any responsibility of assuring an agreement. I will be glad to contribute so far as I can to bring it about, but we may come back here at the end of this recess no better off, no further advanced, than we are, and I think it proper that I should make that statement so that we will proceed with a clear understanding, or at least avoid any possible misunderstanding, and that I ought to make this statement, as I do, before any recess is agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, of course we who are here and participate in the ceremonies of this occasion, if I may so say, appreciate to the full the difficulties which confront us. But there is one thing that we are liable to overlook. Our constituents and the public at large are likely to look upon the proceedings of to-night as a wastefulness of effort, and an expenditure of the people's money that is entirely unjustified by anything that has happened here to-night.

As I said awhile ago, I am one of those who differ with my friend the Senator from Texas. I believe that the country expects, and I believe the testimony which has been adduced here to-night justifies, the exclusion of Mr. LORIMER from the Senate. I say that reluctantly, because I have known and respected him for a great many years. I have learned to love him for his many excellent qualities of head and heart, but I believe, Mr. President, that the testimony which has been adduced here warrants us, as it would warrant any jury under the same circumstances, to render a verdict against him.

However, taking all of these things into consideration, there are other matters which the public expects from us. It expects from us that we shall discharge our duties not only with respect to the individual whose fate is in our hands to-night, but it expects us to discharge our duties with reference to the public weal and the public welfare.

So looking upon this question, it is not only one as to our duties with reference to the sitting Member; it is a question with reference to our duties to many pressing public measures which are resting upon us for decision to-day. One of these important measures is the question which the distinguished Senator from Iowa has insisted shall be determined, as well as the decision of the right of Mr. LORIMER to a seat in this body, and that is the proposal which has been submitted to us in regard to the establishment of a tariff board.

That is not all, Mr. President. There are not only these questions, but there is another very important question for us to determine, and that is as to the reciprocal agreement between the United States and Canada.

But not only that. There are many other questions which devolve upon us as representatives of the people of this great country. There is the great question as to whether we shall continue the Government of the United States by the appropriation of sums of money sufficient to carry on the affairs of Government as they have been carried on in the past.

But leaving all of these questions aside, Mr. President, sitting here as a member of one of the greatest tribunals in the world, realizing my duties and responsibilities, and feeling as I do upon the question now before us it seems to me that no Senator here can refuse to accord to the man who is now on trial not only a prompt but an immediate settlement of his claim to a seat in this body. It may be, Mr. President, that we may determine he is not entitled to a seat in this body. It may be that we may determine that he ought to be excluded from the Senate. But whatever may be the decision of this great tribunal, it is our duty to determine it at once, and then all things which follow may follow in the ordinary sequence of events.

I say, Mr. President, in according to Mr. LORIMER the rights which the Constitution of the United States, which the constitution of every civilized body accords to him, it is our duty in determining that question to say whether these other great questions which come near to the hearts of the American people shall also be determined promptly. In that respect I agree heartily with the contention of the Senator from Iowa; and while I do not insist upon it as a condition precedent, the Senate, as a deliberative body second to none on the face of the globe, ought to determine these questions now in a manner becoming to the dignity of this tribunal.

I was about to ask, Mr. President, that we come to a vote now, first upon the question as to whether Mr. LORIMER is entitled to a seat in this body, and, second, as to whether we shall have a tariff board; but upon the suggestion of my distinguished friend from Texas I simply leave that question open.

Mr. BAILEY. It has been suggested that it would be more agreeable to some Senators to meet at 11 o'clock instead of 11.30, so I modify my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas that the Senate stand in recess until 11 o'clock? The Chair hears none, and the Senate stands in recess until 11 o'clock.

Accordingly (at 8 o'clock and 10 minutes a. m., Tuesday, Feb. 28) the Senate took a recess until 11 o'clock a. m.

AFTER RECESS.

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., at the expiration of the recess.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 315, submitted by Mr. BEVERIDGE on January 9, 1911, as follows:

Resolved, That WILLIAM LORIMER was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Illinois.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has the floor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry in my own right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair begs to correct the Senator about that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I submit to the Chair the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very good; the Chair will listen to the Senator anyhow.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The parliamentary inquiry, as the Chair will see, is an important one. This is a continuation, as I understand it, of the legislative day. The parliamentary inquiry is that if this legislative day should continue to and past 12 o'clock, will that vitiate the special order for that time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It certainly will.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The special order, I understand, is the vote upon Senate joint resolution 134, proposing an amendment of the Constitution providing for the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people.

Mr. President, that being the case, I ask unanimous consent that at 11 o'clock and 55 minutes the Senate shall stand adjourned. In that way we can save the special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks that——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think we need no unanimous consent. The Senate can adjourn without unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I merely want, if the Senator will permit me a moment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I merely want to say that I submitted my parliamentary inquiry, thinking that the status was as the Chair ruled, and therefore I call the attention of every Senator present to the predicament in which we may find ourselves that Senators can all have it in mind in case anyone should make a motion to adjourn, which I shall do.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have been thinking of it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11.50.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At 11.50 to-day?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11.50 to-day.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion has been made which is not debatable.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am aware of that. I do it only by sufferance. The motion as I understood it——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it ought not to be done even by sufferance.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well; I think the Chair is right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to make a suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not debatable. An objection, even, is debate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not debating it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair just stopped the Senator from Indiana on the theory that anything is debate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent to make a suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent to make a suggestion. Is there objection?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not want to object to the Senator asking unanimous consent, but it has been ruled against me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest that we are in the legislative day of the 27th day of February, and an adjournment, even if it was taken to a period 15 minutes hence, would be an adjournment to meet on the 28th.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We understand that.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator may understand it, but it was not so expressed. I think if we keep our dates straight we will have no trouble.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I move to amend my motion to make it more definite and clear. It is to adjourn to 11.50 on this calendar day, February 28.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it, and the motion is carried.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon on the motion for a recess to 8 o'clock I voted for a recess and went away supposing it had carried and feeling quite unwell I went home and went to bed. I did not know of the continuous night session until this morning, when I had notice to come here at 10 o'clock. Having learned the history of last night's transactions briefly from several gentlemen I want to make a little statement.

I do not believe that anybody on the Democratic side of this Chamber wishes to postpone or delay for one moment a vote on the Lorimer case. I believe when I say that I represent every Democrat here. It is certainly my sentiment. On the other hand, when it comes to passing the tariff board bill, which in my opinion should not have been put in here at a short session for the dominant party to deprive Democrats coming in of the instrumentality which they will choose for themselves, I will not consent to take that up at any time.

But I want to say further that there is no disposition on my part, or on the part of any Democrat here, to filibuster on anything. If there shall be an extra session, it will be welcomed by many gentlemen on the Democratic side, but not by me, for I think it will most seriously affect the beginning of what is predicted a prosperous year and very much arrest industrial enterprises and the rising values of the country.

The Republicans are here in a very large majority and can at any moment pass any bill they choose to take up if they can come to an agreement, and it can be voted upon either yea or nay. I do not believe and I certainly would very much dislike to think that any Senator can be influenced by any intimation from the White House as to anything affecting his conscience, but in a matter of expediency and policy we must take note of the utterances of that gentleman by gentlemen who stand or fall with him when he chooses to do so, with or without reason.

It does not seem to me, briefly, that this treaty is of sufficient importance to make this great trouble. It is raising a tempest to waft a feather or drown a fly. I have weighed that treaty as a member of the committee as carefully as I could, and I do not find that taking it altogether its advantages or disadvantages are very great. It will affect a local interest injuriously here and another local interest favorably there.

I announced to that committee distinctly that I would not support the treaty for its commercial advantages but simply because, as there are only three peoples upon this continent, each one extending to either ocean, we must exercise some statesmanship in providing for a friendly mental attitude with our good neighbors north and south that will make them so friendly to us by the close interweaving of commercial, social, and domestic ties that they would be in the future unwilling to furnish on their soil a basis for military operations from either ocean against the United States.

That is what has influenced me. But I was only one of two on that committee who really approved of the bill putting the agreement in operation. I mean on all sides, there are only two members who really at heart favored that reciprocity treaty.

Now, I am not so much wedded to my opinion, nor have I so much of the vanity of consistency as will maintain the record I made in that committee. The consistency which I have always endeavored to maintain here is that of doing what I thought was best under all circumstances, and circumstances frequently make me change my mind.

I am willing now to have that agreement come up and to dispose of it in the interest of the public welfare, to vote to kill it if necessary, but I am informed this morning that the President would not for a moment submit to the defeat of that agreement by an arrangement for its defeat. I can not see the difference between an out-and-out arrangement of the changes of mind in some men to vote for or against the agreement and any other arrangement that is usual in legislation to secure the passage or defeat of a measure.

I regret, Mr. President, that there seems to be engendered somewhat in this attrition of wishes, and that on the floor of the Senate, a little bit of acrimony which has heretofore kept out of the Senate, at least for some time. I heard with great pleasure this morning from the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] that the speech of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] last night rose to a great height in the expression of his sentiment for preserving the peace and good order and dignity of the Senate and acting in good faith toward everyone.

Now, I want to say, I will be here only four days. My public career will close and I will retire to my farm. As Thomas Jefferson said when he was asked to run a third time by the legislature of Vermont, I want to go to my farm with clean and empty hands.

I love peace, and there is nothing on earth that so distresses me as strife and conflict. I am willing to make any sacrifice I can for peace. There has been no reason for any display of feeling that I know of. The Democrats have won a large and, in some measure, an unexpected success at the polls. The Republicans have suffered unexpected reverses in a larger measure than they had expected. But I have heard of no gloating over the Democratic triumph on this side, nor have I noted any particular depression on that side. It is simply one of the vicissitudes of political fortune, and no man need be either unduly elated or depressed or discouraged. The country has not given us the whole legislative branch of the country. The people have given us a large majority in the House. The Republicans will still control the Senate by a working majority. This ought to be a guaranty to the country that there will be neither hasty nor ill-considered legislation. But above all, if it is possible, let us agree to go on with this business in an orderly way without any intention of dilatory motions or anything of that sort.

Of course, if a Senator like my friend from Kansas has something to say on a vital or great question he should say it, and so should everybody else, but nothing for the mere purpose of obstruction.

I look at this situation as a man almost on the outside. Since I have been speaking there has come into my mind a few verses from an old Greek poet, which perhaps the Senate will indulge me in repeating, for I think they are extremely applicable to the situation in hand. It was the invocation or exhortation of an old Greek poet to his own soul. His name is now very rarely ever heard, for his splendid genius is only attested by some magnificent fragments that fortunately for posterity were embedded in the writings of other people. His name was Archilochus, and he and Sappho were adjudged by the Greeks of the classic age of Greece, the age of Pericles, as being the two who were second only to Homer. His lines, if you will allow me, were these:

Tossed on a sea of troubles, soul, my soul,
  Thyself do thou control;
And to the weapons of advancing foes
  A stubborn breast oppose;
Undaunted 'mid the hostile might
Of squadrons burning for the fight,
Thine be no boasting when the victor's crown
  Wins thee deserved renown;
Thine no dejected sorrow, when defeat
  Would urge a base retreat:
Rejoice in joyous things—nor overmuch
  Let grief thy bosom touch
'Midst evil, and still bear in mind
How changeful are the ways of human kind.

Although that was written 700 years before the beginning of the Christian era, yet neither before nor since has there been a sounder philosophy or a manlier sentiment expressed in nobler verse. It is a lesson that we can take each one for himself.

I think I have stated the position of the minority.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not understand that the Senator from Mississippi attempted to speak for all upon this side, but lest there should be any misunderstanding I wish to state my personal views briefly upon the matters which he has discussed.

Personally I do not favor postponing or preventing a vote upon any of the questions that are now under consideration; but I could not join with the Senator from Mississippi in an endeavor to prevent a vote regarding the tariff board. I am for a tariff board as an enlightened method of ascertaining facts upon most complicated questions. I do not fear that a tariff board appointed by President Taft will embarrass the Democratic Party in its work regarding the revision of the tariff. I am willing, so far as I am concerned, with reference to the Democratic nominees upon that board to trust a President who appointed upon the Supreme Bench a White, a Lurton, and a Lamar. I do not believe that that board, however appointed, whether partisan or nonpartisan or bipartisan, will fail to discharge its full duty in the ascertainment of facts. I believe that the oath they will take and the quasi-judicial capacity in which they will act will impress their action in ascertaining the facts, and that for the present unscientific method of ascertaining the facts, a method which has been hitherto pursued by both parties and which, in my judgment, has the disapproval of the entire country, we will have substituted a method of careful examination of all the facts relating to foreign commerce, just as we have to-day an examination of the facts relating to interstate commerce; and that a bipartisan board will be as fair, as just, and as true in its ascertainment of all the facts relating to foreign commerce as has been the present Interstate Commerce Commission, a bipartisan commission, with reference to interstate commerce. So, instead of opposing a vote upon the tariff board bill, so far as I am individually concerned, I shall do everything to facilitate it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 11 o'clock and 21 minutes a. m., Tuesday, February 28, 1911) the Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 28, 1911, at 11 o'clock and 50 minutes a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 27, 1911.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To make a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman at this time for that purpose, as the Chair is notified that a conference committee desires to make a report.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, may I make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If there are some conference reports to be disposed of, does that necessarily debar us from having District day after they are disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The House at any time can determine what business it desires to consider, but with the enrollment of the appropriation bills just in front of us, and all of them practically to be settled, the Chair must take notice of the status of the public business. The House can, if it desires, refuse to consider a conference report.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I intended to call up this morning a privileged bill from the Committee on Ways and Means, but I cheerfully give way for the conference report; but following that I propose to call up my bill.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 29360) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the accompanying statement may be read in lieu of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up a conference report and asks unanimous consent that the statement accompanying the conference report may be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the statement.

The Clerk read the statement.

(For conference report and statement see RECORD of Saturday, February 25, 1911, page 3444.)

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the House agree to the conference report.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present. We ought to have a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is not a quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-seven gentlemen are present—not a quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ames	Esch	Hitchcock	Malby
Andrus	Fassett	Hollingsworth	Maynard
Ansberry	Focht	Howard	Millington

Small	Sperry	Wallace	Woodyard

The SPEAKER. The roll call shows 273 Members present, including the Speaker—a quorum.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to, and the doorkeepers were directed to open the doors.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, the conferees of the Senate and the House have come to a complete agreement, except upon one item, the assay office in North Carolina. That will be taken up after the conference report is considered. The conference report, although it was not required to be printed, was included as a part of my remarks on Saturday last, and Members will find it on page 3444 of the RECORD. The statement has just been read.

It seems to me the only item that the House has shown interest in, and which I should expect would excite attention now is the salary of the Secretary to the President. Members will remember that the Senate put on an amendment raising it from $6,000 to $10,000. The House disagreed to that amendment. It went back to conference and the conferees have now compromised, raising it from $6,000 to $7,500. Whether that will meet the views of the House, of course I can not tell. Inasmuch as I was in favor of $10,000, I am in favor of $7,500. If any Member desires to debate that question I will be glad to yield to him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the action of the conferees is a distinct repudiation of what were practically the instructions from the House. This is the second instance in which the conferees upon this bill have ignored the action of the House upon specific items.

When the conference report was before the House on the 16th of February, the gentleman from Massachusetts moved to recede and concur in the Senate amendment which fixed the compensation of the Secretary to the President at $10,000 per year. Upon a division taken on that question, 52 Members voted in favor of the motion and 130 Members voted in opposition to it. The RECORD shows that the gentleman from Massachusetts then asked for tellers, and not a sufficient number of Members arose to give tellers on the vote. The RECORD then shows that the following transpired:

> Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adhere.
> Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it is proper to leave it to the conferees; the conferees will understand this, and I will say to my friend from New York that if it ever comes back I will stand by him.
> Mr. FITZGERALD. We might as well settle it now.
> Mr. MANN. I do not think it is fair to the conferees.
> Mr. FITZGERALD. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the motion. I will move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the two Senate amendments.
> The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. Speaker, unquestionably a great majority of the House would have voted in favor of the motion to adhere to the House disagreement to the Senate amendment, and that amendment would never have gone back to conference if the motion had been insisted upon; but it was not insisted upon, out of courtesy to the conferees on the part of the House, and in the belief that they would represent the sentiment of this House and not recede on an item upon which there had been such a substantial vote in opposition.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has not the excuse on this occasion usually given by conferees, that this is a complete agreement upon this bill, and that it is necessary to effect a compromise in order to complete the work. They report back in disagreement four amendments upon which the House and Senate can not agree. There is no excuse whatever, publicly given, for the failure of the conferees to respect the sentiment of the House upon this occasion.

Mr. Speaker, if the House is to pass upon the compensation of this official, it should be given an opportunity to do it, if the conferees could not have agreed. I insist that the conferees had no right, in view of the record, to have made any compromise or to have taken any action not in harmony with the sentiment of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to enter into a lengthy discussion as to any merit there may be about this proposition; but when the Secretary to the President appeared before the Committee on Appropriations asking authority to reorganize the White House staff he never suggested or intimated any increase in compensation of the position occupied by him, and the matter has never been presented to any committee of this House.

I am opposed to having items inserted in this way in the Senate and have the House surrender its attitude simply because some gentlemen think they know more than the House does about what it desires. I hope the conference report will be voted down and this item will be sent, with other items in disagreement, back with the notice that the House will not yield its position on this matter.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the criticism of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] upon the conferees is just. It is quite true the House did express itself decisively against the salary of $10,000, but it does not follow that the House would be equally opposed to a salary of $7,500, the same salary that Members of Congress receive, for an office which, I think, all of us will feel requires as much varied ability and more work than is involved in membership of the House. Therefore we bring it back to the House to decide whether $7,500 shall be allowed. I wish to say in this connection that the statement in the press, which Members doubtless saw yesterday or to-day, that the Secretary to the President has been selected, is not authorized and is not correct. The criticism of the gentleman from New York that this proposition was not brought before the Committee on Appropriations when the readjustment of salaries was made is also unfair, because at that time it was not known that the present secretary was to leave his place. Consequently the need of a change in salary was not appreciated, but since then, when this present secretary announced he would retire, and it was found that it was necessary for the President to get a new secretary, then the salary became a live question, and the administration found that to get the person it wanted required an increase in the salary. I think this increase to $7,500 is reasonable.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts think that there is any difficulty in securing a proper man at a salary of $6,000 a year?

Mr. GILLETT. I would not say that it is impossible. Nobody knows that. I do think that we will be more likely to get a proper man for $7,500 than for $6,000.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. May I ask the gentleman what the salary of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury now is?

Mr. GILLETT. I think it is $5,000.

Mr. MANN. Four thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. TAWNEY. Five thousand dollars. It was increased two years ago.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. There is no difficulty in securing a man for that position, is there?

Mr. GILLETT. Of course there is no difficulty in securing a man at $6,000 as Secretary to the President. We undoubtedly will have a Secretary to the President, no matter what the salary is. What we want is to get the best man.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Is there any difficulty in obtaining a competent man as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury at $5,000 a year?

Mr. GILLETT. I think it would be difficult to get the most competent man for that salary.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman does not mean to say that the present Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Hilles, is not a very competent man.

Mr. GILLETT. For what?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, I think he is. He has proved himself an unusually competent man.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I think so. Now, does it require a more competent and efficient man to be Secretary to the President than to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. GILLETT. He has proved himself so competent that he has been lured away from that office—and I do not think that I am saying anything that is confidential—to a very much more remunerative place outside of the Government.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That is generally the way when they school themselves in that position, not simply altogether on account of competency.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, I do not agree with the gentleman. I think they show their competency there and then prove they are worth a very much larger salary than we pay them, and therefore the Government loses valuable services.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, for the information of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the man who occupies the place as Secretary to the President now was getting $50,000 a year before he took that job.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know whether that is true or not.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, that is true.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear that the newspaper reports are not correct as to the appointment of Mr. Hilles. I know him well, and want to say that he is eminently qualified for any position, and especially as Secretary to the President, and I will be ready to vote for even $10,000 a year salary to a man of his splendid qualifications.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. After he has been Secretary to the President for, say, a year or two, at $7,500, would he not be very likely to be offered a more remunerative position in private life than $10,000 a year? Have we got to place people in positions where they can get better salaries in private life by increasing their salaries in public life?

Mr. GILLETT. Why, we are not educating them; we are simply giving them an opportunity to show their quality. I do not think we want to do that.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit me a suggestion? Does not the gentleman know it is frequently the case that a valuable servant of the State, the secretary of railroad investigating boards, like the State boards of commerce or Interstate Commerce Commission, or something of that kind, when these men get thoroughly competent by their knowledge of the affairs of corporations to enable them to serve the public, then they are offered unreasonable and unusually large sums to take them away from the service of the State?

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, no; I do not know that. Mr. Speaker, as to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that this is not an entire agreement, and therefore it might as well be sent back, because we have got to go back anyway, I think it is a mistaken statement, because this is a complete agreement except as to one small item; and if the House, as I hope it will, disagrees to the Senate amendment to that item, I am very confident that the Senate, when it goes back to them, will recede from it and then we will have a complete agreement.

Mr. PUJO. Will the gentleman answer me one question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. PUJO. I ask this question for information: How much does the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations get a year?

Mr. GILLETT. Four thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. PUJO. Four thousand five hundred dollars? That is his salary for a year?

Mr. GILLETT. Then he gets $2,000 extra.

Mr. PUJO. That is $6,500. As a matter of fact, does he not perform nearly all the labor necessary in the preparation of the appropriation bills, the great supply bills of this House?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; he has a great part of that preparation to do.

Mr. PUJO. How long has he been in that position?

Mr. GILLETT. About 30 years, I think.

Mr. PUJO. Each administration keeps him in that position?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. PUJO. Does not the gentleman believe that his employment or the services performed by him are of more value to the American people than that of secretary or clerk to an executive officer?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not wish to enter into a comparison. I have the very highest admiration for the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations; he is invaluable in that position; but it does not require services which command so high a remuneration outside as the peculiar qualities which are required for a successful Secretary to the President. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to a provision of this conference report, which may be said, in a measure, to repair an injustice done by the first report, but which nevertheless falls far short of doing real justice to certain underpaid Government employees. My colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. KOPP], when the first report was before the House, called attention to some of the items which had been agreed upon by the Senate and House conferees. That report showed, as this one shows, how employees of the rank and file are neglected and discriminated against. Here is a copy of the first report. I ask attention to some of its provisions. For example, it provides an increase for a chief clerk from $3,000 to $4,000—a one-thousand-dollar increase for a man receiving a salary of $3,000. I do not object to that increase. Perhaps he is worth it. Yet it is true that he was already receiving a pretty fair salary. But what follows? To this I ask especial attention. Immediately after the $3,000 clerk's $1,000 increase is this—I read from the report—five firemen at $660, instead of $720, each, as proposed by the Senate.

The Senate, it seems, wished to give the firemen $720 each, but the House conferees objected. Finally all the conferees agreed on $660. These five firemen were to receive only $55, instead of $60, a month each. Refuse them even the little salary of $60 a month, but give a $3,000 man $1,000 more!

However, this time the conferees have reported a provision for eight firemen at $720 each. The suggestion of my colleague seems to have had some effect. This is a slight improvement. It increases the salary of each of these men $60 a year, and yet the total annual salary of $720 is grossly inadequate. The Government of the United States has no business to pay only $60 a month to any reputable man regularly employed in this service. No man can live as a white man, nor as a black man ought to live, in the city of Washington, provide for his family, buy fuel and food and clothing, and perhaps pay rent and now and then a doctor's bill on $15 a week. It is the duty of this Government to pay a decent living wage to every man and woman in its employ.

I am assured by my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN], that no watchman employed by the city of New York receives less than $900 a year. But the Government of the United States, the richest—yes, vastly the richest—employer in the world, pays its watchmen only $720 a year, and they work—at least some of them do—every day in the year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman know why we can not afford to pay those men more?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, I have an idea.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We are too busy wasting our money in other enterprises. We have got to defend the country and the canal and build ships and all that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, it is true that not all Government employees are underpaid, though many of them are; but I ask the candid judgment of every man on this floor as to whether it is right that the Government of the United States should pay watchmen who work every day in the year, including Sundays, as one of them told me last week he did, only $60 a month. My attention has only recently been called to this subject. One of these watchmen mentioned it to me. He has a wife and four children. Week before last he said to me: "Mr. COOPER, I do not know that I ought to speak to you about it, but I have used up my little savings, and it worries my wife and me almost to death to know what to do. I can not go into anything else; I have no other business. I get only $60 a month. The price of living is going up so that we barely can keep soul and body together."

He is an employee of the United States Government in this city in one of the most magnificent buildings in the world.

There are many Government clerks and other employees whose wages are too small.

Now, a man is not necessarily a demagogue because he speaks here as a friend of these underpaid men and women. Advocates of better wages for these people are not demagogues. This is a question of simple justice. It is utterly wrong for the United States Government to have any person work for it in any capacity for the meager, inadequate pay now received by many in its employ. When the opportunity comes, I shall do what I can to help get adequate salaries for the faithful body of Government employees. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts a moment ago stated he had been in favor of increasing the salary of the Secretary to the President to $10,000 a year, and therefore, of course, he was in favor of the present proposition of $7,500. I do not agree with him. I was in favor of increasing the salary of the Secretary to the President to $10,000. I would be in favor of increasing the salary of the secretary to $15,000, but not to $7,500. The idea in my mind as to increasing the salary to a large amount is in order to make the Secretary to the President practically an assistant to the President and receive such a salary that he would be on a plane where he could send for Cabinet officers receiving a salary of $12,000 a year and give to them directions when necessary, so that he might help the President in performing the manifold and numerous duties which are imposed upon him. But when it comes to merely increasing the salary from $6,000 to $7,500, that reason does not prevail. This is like any other increase. The Secretary to the President now receives a salary of $6,000. He receives an automobile allowance, which amounts, probably, to $2,500 a year. He is provided, like the Cabinet officers and the President, with transportation, which no other official of the Government receives. And the salary of $6,000 with those allowances ought to obtain, and have obtained, the services of an efficient secretary to perform the duties which are now imposed upon the Secretary to the President. And to merely increase the amount to $7,500 would not in any respect change the character of the secretary or the character of the duties imposed upon him.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Can the gentleman inform the House how long the Secretary to the President has received $6,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. About three or four years. It was raised from $5,000 three or four years ago.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does not the gentleman think the ordinary duties of the President's secretary are increasing yearly very much, indeed?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly; they have increased very much, because the work performed by the President is increasing.

Members of Congress and everybody else want to go to see the President personally. They are not satisfied to see a $6,000 secretary. They would not be satisfied to see a $7,500 secretary. They would be satisfied to see an assistant President who could give directions to Cabinet officers. But that question is not before us.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. YOUNG.]

Mr. YOUNG of New York. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to register my serious protest against the salaries that are being paid to the employees of the Government. Mr. COOPER has brought out here the fact which has been running through my mind constantly since I have been in this House, that there are hundreds and thousands of men who are in the employ of the Government who are being paid beggarly salaries, salaries inadequate to keep them decently and support their families or to enable them to do their work efficiently. I have been surprised constantly to find men working for the Government at salaries so meager that it seemed almost impossible for them to keep soul and body together.

In the city of New York or in any other of the great cities of this country men are being paid more whose services are not so valuable, whose work is not so important, as that of those who are employed by the Government in the city of Washington. I say that $720—and in a number of cases I find on the roll people employed at salaries as low as $600 a year—is an insult to the people of this country. There are those here who have stood up for organized labor in a manly, honest, and energetic way, to see that it is properly taken care of. Here is a great body of employees of the Government who have no organization, who have no protection, who are dependent upon the action of this House to give them an adequate amount to live on.

Now, I want to speak of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury and of the Secretary to the President. There are three men who are Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury who are worth twice as much as they are being paid, and who could earn twice or three times as much as they now receive if they were in private employment. The Secretary to the President came into the position at a much less compensation than he had been earning.

Some say he had been receiving $30,000 or $40,000 a year and that he sacrificed a very large income to come into the service of the President of the United States at a salary of $6,000 a year. It is proposed now—or the newspapers have stated—that one of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury is to be taken from that position and appointed as Secretary to the President. I say to you, as to that gentleman, that he is worth $10,000 or $15,000 or $20,000 a year in private life. I tell you the great corporations and the large individual employers doing a great business need such men. Men become competent, men become qualified, and are just at their most useful point when they are taken from the service of the Government by individuals and corporations, and I say this office of Secretary to the President is worth $7,500 if it is worth anything. There is hardly any gentleman in this House who would take it for the money that is in it, and those who do take the office take it for the honor and not for the compensation.

Now, I ask gentlemen on both sides of this House to be fair to the Government employees, to pay them something like what they are worth, and not fix an arbitrary rule, as has been done here—that any man who is paid $1,200 or more shall not be advanced. I think this is unreasonable and unfair. I think the salary of the Secretary to the President should be made $7,500 a year at least. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri three minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have been somewhat interested in the debate that has taken place on this proposition to raise the salary of the Secretary to the President from $6,000 to $7,500 per year. Gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, as an argument in favor of this increase, have called attention to the woeful condition of Federal employees in and about the city of Washington. I want to suggest Mr. Speaker, that it comes a little late and with poor grace from the Republican majority on this floor, the party that has been in absolute control of the legislative machinery of this Government for 16 years, at all times having a strong partisan majority on this floor, with every opportunity and facility, with nothing wanting except inclination, to introduce and pass bills which would relieve the condition of these employees who are drawing meager salaries, and yet have stubbornly failed and refused to do one thing looking toward the alleviation of the condition of those for whom they pretend to plead, though the proposed amendment has no reference to them. After this Republican majority has been driven from place and power in the expiring moments of this session they seek to go before the country with a plea in favor of men who work for small salaries.

It would have been more commendable and doubtless more gratifying to employees in the departments of the Government if our Republican friends who are now such firm advocates of higher wages for the poor man had made an effort in that direction while they had the power and when they could have carried some relief to the underpaid clerks in Washington. [Applause.]

It looks to me like this is a mere play to the galleries. If gentlemen are in earnest about it, why have you not taken action before? You gentlemen who favor an increase of big salaries have had the power at every session of Congress to recommend increases of salaries for those who are drawing the small salaries. But we heard nothing of it until now, when a different political party is about to assume responsibility in this House, and now gentlemen who have been indifferent to the appeals of the low-salaried clerks during all the time they have been in control of legislation fall upon the necks of their fellows and weep over the condition of the unfortunate clerks. [Applause.] It looks to me like hypocrisy, and I want to be very mild in my language—in fact, I am always mild. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired and the gentleman has no time to yield.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If I am given time I will gladly answer the gentleman.

Mr. GILLETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I favored the increase of the salary of the Secretary to the President from $6,000 to $10,000, and I am in favor of this increase, it not being possible to secure the former recommendation. I favor this because no matter who the man is that performs that service he stands in that class of relationship with the President of the United States that he is entitled to all the salary that Congress will appropriate for the office.

I said in discussing this item before that we make a mistake, and some of us are doubtless prejudiced against the increase because of the title which this office carries. The title of secretary to anybody does not imply independent responsibility, executive or administrative authority. It does not imply executive ability and executive responsibility. We are too apt to form our judgment of what compensation should be allowed by the title of the office rather than by the duties and responsibilities of that office.

Mr. Speaker, the duties of the President of the United States are being increased constantly by the Congress of the United States. We at every session of Congress impose upon him executive work and responsibility not with the idea that he himself will personally superintend the doing of that work, but with the knowledge of the fact that it will be necessary for him to delegate the discharge of these duties to some subordinate.

I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that the President of the United States should have a man there with experience, both legislative and executive, capable of discharging almost any duty that the President of the United States is required to discharge. But the President will never be able to get a man of that character, a man of that experience, as long as the title of "secretary" is retained. I do not believe that if you were to make the salary $15,000 or $20,000 a year that it would be sufficiently attractive to any man who is capable, who has the experience and the judgment that a man should have to act as assistant to the President of the United States. You must make the title to the position so that it will imply executive authority, so that it will imply responsibility, and then you will attract men who are capable of discharging these duties and responsibilities that from time to time are placed upon the President of the United States and which must be delegated by him in the very nature of things.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How long has the gentleman entertained these views that it is necessary to increase the salary?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have entertained them for some time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has been in a position where he might have brought some recommendation into the House and made this speech on a bill properly before the House, but he has been suspiciously silent.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 122, noes 115.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 151, nays 145, answered "present" 7, not voting 81, as follows:

On this vote:

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts with Mr. HOWLAND.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, there is one matter left in which there is a disagreement between the Senate and the House, and that is the matter of abolishing the assay office at Charlotte, N. C. I believe the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] wishes to make a preferential motion, or I shall——

The SPEAKER. Covered by one amendment or several?

Mr. GILLETT. There are several amendments, but it all relates to one. I ask unanimous consent that they may be considered together.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 99, page 84, after line 24, insert "assay office at Charlotte, N. C."

Amendment 100, page 84, after line 24, insert "assayer and melter, $1,500."

Amendment No. 101, page 84, after line 24, insert "for wages of workmen and other clerks and employees, $900."

Amendment 102, page 84, after line 24, insert "for incidental and contingent expenses, $500."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate just read and concur in the same.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. This is a preferential motion, but under the rules and practices the gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman wish to argue the question?

Mr. WEBB. For about three minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief, because this matter was before the House last week. A few days ago, when we had about 60 Members present, this matter came up for consideration, and on a very close vote they continued the disagreement. I feel like apologizing to the House for discussing a matter which only involves an extra expenditure on the part of the Government of the insignificant sum of just $700. It is too small to haggle about, and yet that is the trouble between the Senate and the House now. I congratulate the House conferees on having settled all the other differences amicably, and this is the only one left in difference between the House and the Senate. The question is whether for the benefit of 206 depositors of gold at the assay office at Charlotte, N. C., the Government of the United States shall simply spend the infinitesimal sum of $700. It appears to you gentlemen a very small item perhaps. The amount of money that the Government will be called upon to pay will be only $700 for keeping this historic institution open. It was built in 1831 on a tract of land that only cost the Government $40, which tract of land now is worth about $250,000, and because this assay office does not pay the Government of the United States a revenue, the Secretary of the Treasury recommends that it be discontinued, that he can get along without it. I submit, gentlemen, on a parity of reasoning, that we ought to abolish the entire Post Office Department of the United States; that on a parity of reasoning we ought to abolish the Navy and the Army, because some might get along without those. On the same parity of reasoning other things could be left out which carry millions of money. Down in North Carolina we have a gold-producing section, where the production of gold is increasing very much. This last year the production of gold increased 80 per cent, and it is increasing every year, and 206 depositors deposited their gold in this office last year, making it a great saving and convenience not only to North Carolina, but Virginia and Georgia as well. Gentlemen, I say to this House that we can not afford to indulge in such cheeseparing. Our State is a modest State, and has never asked for much from this Government, but now the North Carolina Legislature has asked that this Congress do not discontinue this historic institution. The Greater Charlotte Club, one of the largest financial and business organizations between Washington and Atlanta, Ga., has petitioned Congress not to discontinue this office for the sake of the pitiful sum of $700. Consider the good it does and what good it will do to keep it up, and the great convenience of it to the people. Now, gentlemen, I have made this statement to you frankly, and all I wanted to do was to lay the situation before you and ask at your hands that you will not abolish this great institution, which is of so much value in my district. North Carolina will appreciate your consideration of her wishes. The magnificent city of Charlotte will feel grateful to you; and, of course, my appreciation will be unbounded if you will save this office. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that, of course, the gentleman from North Carolina does not wish the assay office there abolished. None of us like to have patronage or expenditure taken away from our States, but if we are going to turn down reforms recommended to us by the department because of personal reasons like this any desire or effort at economies from the department will utterly be discouraged.

Now, it is $2,500 instead of $700, as the gentleman says. The department told us that it is absolutely needless that there should be any assay office in North Carolina. There is no accommodation to speak of to the miners; there is no remuneration to the United States. It is a constant expense. It could exactly as well be done at the other assay offices, with no noticeable increase of expense, and they recommended that in the interests of economy and good administration it should be so done. The House supported the committee. The Senate, where we sometimes think personal influence counts for more than it does here, insisted that this should go back. But I believe now, if the House disagrees, it will end the matter and the recommendation of the Secretary will be carried out, as I hope it will.

I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] three minutes.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. May I ask the gentleman a question first?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Does not the Government still assay at the Charlotte assay office $100,000 annually in gold?

Mr. GILLETT. It assayed $88,000.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Does not that pay expenses and more than pay expenses?

Mr. GILLETT. It does not anywhere near pay expenses.

Mr. WEBB. Last year it was $149,000.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. The gold coming to the assay office is constantly increasing, and my colleague says it has increased 90 per cent in the last year.

Mr. GILLETT. He is mistaken. It is a decrease instead of an increase. I have the figures right here in the report of the Director of the Mint.

Now I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the small items in this bill that we have had a disagreement upon, and the chief reason, perhaps, why some are opposed to its remaining in the bill or being accepted by the House conferees is the fact that the assay office at St. Louis went out. The gentlemen from North Carolina and the Senators that are contending so strenuously for this amendment, and the Legislature of North Carolina, are not responsible for that assay office in St. Louis going out of the bill. I want to suggest to the gentlemen on this side of the House, at least, that there is a great deal of gold in that vicinity. Above the water in the soil it can be worked; below the water it is mixed with sulphur, and they are now endeavoring to get a process by which the sulphur can be separated from the gold; and if that is done that mint there ought to be kept open, by all means. You closed the mint in Louisiana from handling gold; our own mint in Georgia, at Dahlonega, has been closed for quite a while, and all the gold in north Georgia has been brought to Charlotte. It is not a question of economy, and I want to suggest it is not $2,400 or $2,700, because we agreed to concede all of them almost, taking only $1,800.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Did you hear the amendment read? It was $2,400 or $2,500.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I know what the amendment is.

Mr. GILLETT. That is what it is.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I know the conferees at the other end have agreed to cut it almost in two.

Mr. GILLETT. And it is before us as $2,400, and that is what the gentleman has agreed to concede.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] said $700, and you got up and said $2,400, and I have a right to say the conferees agreed to $1,800. [Laughter.] That is all there is in it. I know what the amendment is. I am not asleep.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] two minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope Members on this side of the Chamber will vote for the motion submitted by the gentlemen from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. Now, I know of my own personal knowledge that recently a large company has been organized and is now actively at work in the gold-mining business in North Carolina. It has purchased a large amount of valuable machinery and shipped it into that State, and has inaugurated an extensive mining operation. I hope that this assay office will be continued until we can go further into practical, up-to-date mining development of that region of the South.

I believe that with improved machinery gold mining can be made profitable in North Carolina, Georgia, and Tennessee, and I hope that the Republican side of this Chamber will not at this stage in the mineral development of the Southern States do anything to discourage, but, on the contrary, will do everything to encourage, the successful development of the resources of the Appalachian mining region.

This is a very small appropriation, and I trust that a Republican House will not take the responsibility of blotting out an institution that has been in operation almost a hundred years. Such an action will be construed as an act of unfriendliness on the part of a Republican Congress toward the South, and I hope we will not take that responsibility, but that we will go on record as sustaining the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Now, there are lots of appropriations that, perhaps, are not needed in other branches and departments of this Government, and if you are going to inaugurate a system of cleaning out and cutting off I hope we can begin somewhere else than at Charlotte, N. C., on the comparatively small appropriation of $2,500. And if there is no other reason that will appeal to this side of the House, the fact that the State of North Carolina gave to the country and to this House the splendid man that occupies the position of Speaker of this House, should be sufficient. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from North Carolina has said, this is a small matter from a financial standpoint, and it might easily be disposed of if it were not for the fact that a question of even-handed justice is involved in the case. If the gentleman from North Carolina had made the eloquent speech which he delivered here this morning before the Committee on Appropriations, when the matter was up in that committee, and then had made it when it was up in the House originally, he might probably have played on the sympathies of the Democratic side with sufficient strength and I might have played upon the sympathies of the Republican side sufficiently to have saved both the Charlotte and St. Louis assay offices.

Mr. WEBB. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No. I regret that I must decline. I have but five minutes.

When at the beginning of this session it became known that the Treasury Department had recommended the abolishment of these two assay offices in accordance with a plan of economy and reform, I appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and told them that the assay office at St. Louis should be continued in any event, no matter what might happen to others, first, for the reason that we are paying no rent, inasmuch as the assay office there is in a Government building; secondly, that our business there had increased 700 per cent during the last five years; and, thirdly, that the expense of assaying the gold would be just as much as, if not more than, it would be anywhere else if the assaying were not done at the St. Louis office. But in spite of these representations the committee came to the conclusion that the assay offices both at St. Louis and Charlotte should be abolished.

Mr. COWLES. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COWLES. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield for just a suggestion?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I will if I have the time at my disposal. I have a long story to tell.

Mr. COWLES. I remember hearing the gentleman from Missouri state that they paid no rent at the assay office at St. Louis. I want to say to the gentleman and to the House that the Government also owns the United States mint at Charlotte, and that we pay no rent there.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That has been already stated. The two assay offices are on all fours, so far as that is concerned. But, Mr. Speaker, the friends of Charlotte slept on their rights when the Committee on Appropriations considered the matter, and they slept on their rights when the matter was up originally in the House; and not until a gentleman representing that State in the other House, a member of the conference committee on this bill, moved to insert Charlotte did they wake up and ask this House to reinsert Charlotte and leave St. Louis out. I say that would be unfair discrimination in favor of Charlotte and against the great city which I have the honor to represent on this floor.

Now, I would be in favor of either putting them both back or striking them both out. But you can not come here now and ask that Charlotte be inserted and St. Louis left out, when, as a matter of fact, St. Louis does three or four more times as much business as is done at Charlotte.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. What is it?

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman charges me with not making a fight in favor of this proposition. I want to say that I was at home with a sick child, and that is why the fight was not made.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am not criticizing the gentleman from North Carolina, I am merely stating facts. I want this House to know that while the Representatives from North Carolina were silent I raised my voice before the committee as well as in the House in behalf of my city, and it would be a great injustice to me, as well as to the people of St. Louis, if, because of the action of the Senate, the larger of the two assay offices were abolished and the smaller continued. The parliamentary status of the matter is now such that St. Louis can not be inserted, and therefore to carry out the plans of the Treasury officials, the amendment of the Senate in favor of Charlotte should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES].

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Speaker, I want to appeal to our friends on this side of the Chamber to not turn us down on this proposition because of the fact that St. Louis has not won out.

Mr. MANN. But they turned the gentleman down.

Mr. COWLES. That is true; yet, I hope our friends on this side of the Chamber will stand by us.

Mr. MANN. We should feel better about it if they had not unjustly turned down the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COWLES. Well, I appreciate the compliment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] thus pays me, and while I deplore the lack of good judgment displayed by them in turning me down, still I harbor no ill will against them for that, and hope my friends on this side will vote with me.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, in view of repeated insinuations and statements of hostility with Japan, I desire to insert in the RECORD the following statement:

[By Associated Press.]

TOKYO, Wednesday, February 1 (mail correspondence).

A meeting of Americans resident in Japan was held in Yokohama recently in the interest of international peace movements. A resolution designed to refute the reports that public sentiment in this country is hostile to the United States, was adopted as follows:

"Resolved, That in our opinion the people of Japan have at all times entertained the most friendly and cordial sentiments toward the Government and people of the United States, and that there has never been, and is not now, any feeling other than one of confidence and gratitude. We believe, upon evidence which can not be doubted, that there is not to be found in the Japanese Empire any wish or thought other than to maintain the most friendly and cordial relations with the Republic of the United States, and that any representations to the contrary, wherever emanating, and from whatever cause proceeding, are baseless calumnies which, if uncontradicted, can only result in vast material losses to the people of both Governments and in creating an unhappy prejudice between them."

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will decide this not on the sympathy for St. Louis or North Carolina, but agree with the recommendation of the department for economy. If they do not, it will discourage all efforts in that line.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WEBB) there were 115 ayes and 45 noes.

Mr. GILLETT. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded. All those in favor of taking the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-four gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to amend the motion by inserting "St. Louis."

Mr. GILLETT. I make the point of order that it is too late.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard, the yeas and nays are refused, and the motion is agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 31856) making appropriations for the District of Columbia. I desire to say that the point raised on Saturday has been stricken from the bill, and the conferees of the two Houses have arrived at a full and free agreement. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the conference report and statement be omitted. The statement was read on Saturday, and I suppose no gentleman will care to have it read again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the reading of the report and statement may be omitted.

The statement of the managers on the part of the House is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 31856) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1912 submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying report as to each of the said amendments, namely:

On amendments Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, relating to the executive offices: Increase the salaries of the commissioners from $5,000 to $6,000 each; 1 stenographer and typewriter from $720 to $840; the purchasing officer from $2,500 to $2,750; 1 clerk from $1,200 to $1,300; 3 clerks from $600 each to $720 each; the inspector of buildings from $2,750 to $3,000; reimburses 2 elevator inspectors for maintenance of motor cycles at $15 per month each; and strikes out the proposed increase of salary of the storekeeper from $900 to $1,000.

On amendment No. 15: Extends to the employees of the District, other than those in the public-school system and police and fire departments, the same provisions of leave of absence as is provided for by law for employees of the executive departments.

On amendments Nos. 16 and 17: Increases the salary of the clerk and stenographer in charge of the force for care of the district building from $1,800 to $2,000.

On amendments Nos. 18 and 19: Provides for an additional clerk at $720 in the assessor's office.

On amendment No. 20: Provides for extra labor in the preparation of tax-sale certificates in the sum of $800, as proposed by the House.

On amendments Nos. 21, 22, 23, and 24, relating to the auditor's office: Makes a verbal correction in the text of the bill, and provides for an additional clerk at $1,000.

On amendments Nos. 25 and 26: Provides for an additional stenographer at $840 in the office of the corporation counsel.

On amendments Nos. 27, 28, and 29: Increases the salary of a clerk in the office of the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets from $1,000 to $1,200.

On amendments Nos. 30, 31, 32, 33, and 34, relating to the engineer commissioner's office: Strikes out the proposed increase in the salaries of the engineer of highways and the superintendent of sewers from $3,000 to $3,300 each; increases the salary of the chief clerk from $2,000 to $2,250; and of one clerk from $1,350 to $1,400.

On amendments Nos. 35 and 36: Appropriates $2,500 for a gasoline motor truck for the municipal architect's office.

On amendments Nos. 37, 38, and 39: Strikes out the proposed increase in the salaries of two clerks from $1,200 to $1,300 each in the special-assessment office.

On amendments Nos. 40, 41, 42, and 43, relating to the office of the superintendent of insurance: Increases the salary of the examiner from $1,500 to $1,700; the statistician from $1,500 to $1,700; and of one clerk from $1,000 to $1,200.

On amendments Nos. 44 and 45: Increases the salary of an assistant computer from $825 to $900 in the surveyor's office.

On amendments Nos. 46, 47, 48, and 49, relating to the free public library: Strikes out the proposed increase in the salary of the assistant librarian from $1,500 to $1,600; provides for one additional assistant at $720, and for one additional cataloguer at $540.

On amendment No. 50: Appropriates $34,500, as proposed by the House, instead of $37,500, as proposed by the Senate, for contingent expenses of the government of the District of Columbia.

On amendment No. 51: Appropriates $10,000, instead of $9,000, as proposed by the Senate, for postage.

On amendments Nos. 52 and 53, relating to the coroner's office: Makes the appropriations available for the "purchase and maintenance of means of transportation," instead of "for livery of horses or horse hire," and inserts the provision, proposed by the Senate, relating to juries of inquest.

On amendment No. 54: Appropriates $500, as proposed by the Senate, for erection of historical tablets.

On amendment No. 55: Limits the use of the fees of the recorder of deeds for purchase of typewriters to those of the year 1911, instead of the years 1911 and 1912.

On amendment No. 56: Makes available during the fiscal year 1912 the appropriation of $10,000 made for the year 1910 for repair of buildings that may be injured by fire.

On amendment No. 57: Inserts the provision, proposed by the Senate, authorizing purchases without advertising for proposals in amounts not exceeding $25.

On amendment No. 58: Appropriates $500, as proposed by the Senate, for purchase of apparatus for the office of the inspector of asphalts and cements.

On amendment No. 59: Strikes out the appropriation, proposed by the Senate, of $3,000 for alterations in the repair shop.

On amendment No. 60: Appropriates $340,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $180,000, as proposed by the House, for assessment and permit work.

On amendment No. 61: Appropriates $10,000, as proposed by the Senate, for paving roadways under the permit system.

On amendments Nos. 62, 63, and 64: Appropriates $79,500, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $61,500, as proposed by the House, for work on streets and avenues.

On amendments Nos. 65, 66, and 67: Strikes out the appropriation of $27,000, proposed by the Senate, for removing granite block and repaving with asphalt Seventh Street from K Street to P Street; appropriates $14,000 for grading and improving Seventeenth Street NW., as proposed by the Senate; and makes the appropriation of $8,000, proposed by the House, available, as proposed by the Senate, for connecting Belmont and Fifteenth Streets NW.

On amendments Nos. 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, and 81: Appropriates $123,650, instead of $77,850 as proposed by the House and $161,600 as proposed by the Senate, for the construction of certain county roads and public streets, and provides that the appropriations in detail for such construction shall constitute one fund.

On amendment No. 82: Inserts the provision proposed by the Senate requiring the Anacostia & Potomac River Railroad Co. to remove and relocate certain of its tracks.

On amendments Nos. 83, 84, and 85: Strikes out the appropriations, proposed by the Senate, of $2,500 for replacing sidewalks on the east side of the White Lot, $1,500 for new sidewalks around the Patent Office, and $2,500 for replacing sidewalks around the old post-office building.

On amendments Nos. 86 and 87: Appropriates $140,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $130,000, as proposed by the House, for repairs of county roads.

On amendment No. 88: Appropriates $16,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $15,000, as proposed by the House, for construction and repair of bridges.

On amendments Nos. 89 and 90: Appropriates $100,000, instead of $75,000, as proposed by the Senate, toward constructing a bridge across Rock Creek on the line of Q Street.

On amendments Nos. 91, 92, 93, and 94, relating to sewers: Appropriates $44,500, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $43,000, as proposed by the House, for the sewage pumping service, and makes the sum available for the maintenance of motor vehicles; appropriates $65,000, instead of $67,000 as proposed by the Senate and $60,000 as proposed by the House, for main and pipe sewers; and $130,000, instead of $161,000 as proposed by the Senate and $110,000 as proposed by the House, for suburban sewers.

On amendment No. 95: Appropriates $260,000, instead of $270,000 as proposed by the Senate and $250,000 as proposed by the House, for sprinkling, sweeping, and cleaning streets.

On amendment No. 96: Strikes out the provision, proposed by the House, which limits the cleaning of snow and ice only from sidewalks in front of public spaces.

On amendment No. 97: Appropriates $128,600 for a stable and storeroom for the street-cleaning department, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments Nos. 98 and 99: Increases the salary of the watchman at the bathing beach from $450 to $480.

On amendments Nos. 100 and 101: Makes the appropriations for playgrounds immediately available and restores to the bill the requirements, proposed by the House, that the appropriation for salaries of persons connected with the playgrounds be paid wholly out of the revenues of the District.

On amendment No. 102: Appropriates $78,000, instead of $125,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the establishment of the interior park.

On amendments Nos. 103, 104, 105, and 106, relating to the electrical department: Increases the salary of the assistant electrical engineer from $1,800 to $2,000; strikes out the provision for one additional electrical inspector at $1,200; and appropriates $13,500, instead of $14,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $13,000, as proposed by the House, for general supplies.

On amendment No. 107: Inserts the provision, proposed by the House, instead of the one proposed by the Senate, to effect a settlement with the Potomac Electric Power Co. for services heretofore rendered.

On amendment No. 108: Appropriates $35,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the preservation and repair of Cabin John Bridge.

On amendment No. 109: Strikes out the provision, proposed by the Senate, authorizing a new highway plan for that portion of the District in the vicinity of Piney Branch parkway.

On amendments Nos. 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, and 118, relating to the public schools: Strikes out all of the changes, proposed by the Senate, with reference to teachers.

On amendments Nos. 119 and 120: Fixes the salary of the janitor for the Western High School at $900, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $1,000, as proposed by the House.

On amendment No. 121: Appropriates $23,500, instead of $25,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $22,000, as proposed by the House, for tools and machinery for instruction in manual training.

On amendment No. 122: Appropriates $15,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $14,550, as proposed by the House, for furniture for new school buildings.

On amendment No. 123: Strikes out the appropriation of $2,600, proposed by the Senate, for a motor delivery wagon for public school supplies.

On amendments Nos. 124, 125, 126, 127, and 128, relating to new school buildings: Appropriates $10,000 for grounds adjacent to the Fillmore School; $75,000 toward a normal school building for colored pupils, to cost not exceeding $200,000; $40,000 for a four-room building in the vicinity of the Burrville School; $54,000 for site and building in the twelfth division; and $60,000 for a site for a new M Street High School; and strikes out $24,000, proposed by the House, for an addition to the Deanwood School.

On amendments Nos. 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, and 139, relating to the Metropolitan police: Strikes out the provision for an additional inspector at $1,800; increases the pay of four surgeons from $600 to $720 each; provides for an additional lieutenant at $1,320, for one additional sergeant at $1,250, one additional private of class one at $900, and for allowance to one additional officer mounted at $260; provides for repairs of a motor patrol; and strikes out the provision, proposed by the Senate, authorizing the deposit to the credit of the police and firemen's relief fund the receipts from licenses other than liquor licenses in addition to the revenues now authorized by law, such sums as may be necessary from time to time to prevent deficiencies in said fund.

On amendments Nos. 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, and 152, relating to the fire department: Strikes out the provision for an additional battalion chief engineer at $2,000; increases the salary of the superintendent of machinery from $1,800 to $2,000; strikes out the increase in salaries of 23 engineers and two marine engineers from $1,150 to $1,200 each; provides for an additional hostler at $600, and inserts the provision, proposed by the Senate, regulating leaves of absence to members of the fire department; strikes out the proposed increase from $15,000 to $16,000 for purchase of horses; appropriates $31,000, instead of $32,000 as proposed by the Senate, and $30,000 as proposed by the House for forage; strikes out the appropriation of $20,000, proposed by the Senate for a repair and storage building; and inserts a provision requiring a report as to the necessity for a high-pressure fire-service system.

On amendments Nos. 153, 154, 155, 156, and 157, relating to the health department: Increases the salary of the poundmaster from $1,200 to $1,500; inserts the provision, proposed by the Senate, requiring inspectors of dairies and dairy farms to act as inspectors of live stock; provides for the prevention of communicable diseases other than those specified in the law; increases the amount that may be expended for personal services from $10,000 to $15,000 out of the appropriation to prevent spread of contagious diseases; and appropriates $10,000 for a new pound.

On amendments Nos. 158, 159, and 160, relating to the juvenile court: Increases the salary of the judge from $3,000 to $3,600; and strikes out the provision for an additional bailiff, at $700.

On amendments Nos. 161, 162, 163, 164, and 165, relating to the police court: Provides for a deputy financial clerk instead of a deputy clerk to be known as financial clerk, at $1,500; increases the salary of the janitor from $540 to $600; and appropriates $1,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $2,000 as proposed by the Senate, for repairs of the Police Court Building.

On amendments Nos. 166, 167, 168, and 169, relating to the municipal court: Provides for an additional assistant clerk, at $1,000, and increases the salary of the janitor from $480 to $600.

On amendment No. 170: Authorizes the employment of an alienist at $1,000 per annum in connection with the expenses of execution of writs of lunacy.

On amendment No. 171: Strikes out the provision, proposed by the Senate, authorizing purchases in open market.

On amendment No. 172: Appropriates $48,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $50,000, as proposed by the Senate, for support of convicts.

On amendments Nos. 173 and 174: Increases the salaries of five laborers from $480 to $600 each in the courthouse.

On amendments Nos. 175, 176, 177, 178, and 179, relating to the court of appeals building: Strikes out the provision for a mechanician at $1,200 and an additional watchman at $600; provides for an additional laborer at $480; and appropriates $900 instead of $1,500, as proposed by the Senate, for miscellaneous expenses of the building.

On amendment No. 180: Appropriates $40,840, as proposed by the Senate, for maintenance of jail prisoners.

On amendment No. 181: Appropriates $25,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $26,000, as proposed by the Senate, for miscellaneous expenses of the supreme court of the District.

On amendments Nos. 182 and 183: Increases the salary of the secretary of the Board of Charities from $3,000 to $3,500.

On amendments Nos. 184, 185, and 186: Increases the salary of the superintendent of nursing at the Washington Asylum and jail from $720 to $840.

On amendments Nos. 187 and 188: Appropriates $25,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $26,000, as proposed by the Senate, for provisions and miscellaneous expenses for the Home for the Aged and Infirm.

On amendments Nos. 189, 190, and 191: Appropriates $500, as proposed by the House, for plans for an additional building, to cost not exceeding $40,000, for the Reform School for Girls.

On amendments Nos. 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, and 201, relating to medical charities: Appropriates $34,000, instead of $35,500, as proposed by the Senate, and $32,500, as proposed by the House, for the Freedmen's Hospital; appropriates $11,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $10,000, as proposed by the House, for the Eastern Dispensary; $4,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $3,000, as proposed by the House, for the George Washington University Hospital; provides for an assistant cook, at $360, increases the salary of the laundryman from $480 to $600, strikes out the proposed increase in the salary of the engineer from $720 to $900, and increases the salary of the farmer from $300 to $360, in the Tuberculosis Hospital, and strikes out the increase in the appropriation proposed by the Senate, from $1,000 to $1,500, for repairs and improvements to buildings and grounds for that institution.

On amendments Nos. 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, and 211, relating to child-caring institutions: Strikes out the provision for an additional placing officer at $1,000 and the increase in the salary of an investigating clerk from $900 to $960 for the Board of Children's Guardians; increases the salary of two assistant caretakers from $300 to $360, and provides for a stableman at $300 for the Industrial Home for Colored Children; strikes out the increase from $6,000 to $7,500 for maintenance and from $250 to $450 for furniture and equipment for the institution.

On amendments Nos. 212 and 213: Inserts the provision proposed by the Senate authorizing the acceptance as a donation the property known as the Night Lodging House; and strikes out the appropriation of $5,000 proposed by the Senate for the Columbia Polytechnic Institute.

On amendment No. 214: Prohibits the use of any appropriation heretofore made, as well as of appropriations contained in the act for 1912, for a reformatory, asylum, or workhouse in Virginia or Maryland within 10 miles of Mount Vernon, except the one at Occoquan.

On amendments Nos. 215, 216, 217, and 218, relating to the workhouse at Occoquan: Appropriates $193,000 instead of $288,000, with $80,000 instead of $91,000 thereof immediately available, for maintenance and operation; and inserts the provision, proposed by the Senate, relative to the delivery to and custody of male and female prisoners in the institution.

On amendments Nos. 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, and 228, relating to the militia: Appropriates $48,000, instead of $49,000 as proposed by the Senate and $47,000 as proposed by the House, for expenses of camps; $2,250, as proposed by the Senate, for cleaning uniforms; $1,250, as proposed by the House, instead of $1,500, as proposed by the Senate, for expenses of target practice; and inserts provisions into the text of the appropriation for payment of troops, proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 229: Appropriates $100,000, as proposed by the Senate, toward the improvement of the Anacostia River Flats.

On amendment No. 230: Strikes out the appropriation of $210,000, proposed by the Senate, for the purchase of Carpenter (Pennsylvania Avenue) tract of land.

On amendment No. 231: Strikes out the proposed authorization of an appropriation of $300,000 for the acquisition of the land known as the Klingleford Valley.

On amendment No. 232: Authorizing the purchase and maintenance of a motor runabout for the water department.

On amendment No. 233: Authorizes the use of $70,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $65,000, as proposed by the House, for personal services in connection with the execution of public works in the District of Columbia.

On amendments Nos. 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, and 249, relating to public lighting: Authorizes rates of $15, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $14.50, as proposed by the House, for 40-candlepower incandescent lamps on overhead wires; $17.50, as proposed by the House, instead of $19, as proposed by the Senate, for 60-candlepower incandescent lamps on overhead wires; $80 instead of $85, as proposed by the Senate, and $72.50, as proposed by the House, for 528 and 550 watt series inclosed and multiple inclosed arc lamps; $72.50, as proposed by the House, instead of $75, as proposed by the Senate, for 320 watt magnetite or other arc lamps; requires replacing of certain electric lights by April 1, 1914, as proposed by the House, instead of 1915, as proposed by the Senate; fixes the limit of cost of lamp-posts and equipment at $60, as proposed by the House, instead of $50, as proposed by the Senate; authorizes a reduction of $6.60, as proposed by the House, instead of $4.40, as proposed by the Senate, from the price of electric arc lamps if the commissioners furnish the equipment therefor; provides that in the event the commissioners have to adopt forms of electric street lighting other than those provided for in the bill, a fair sum for the cost of maintenance may be allowed; prohibits public electric lighting by overhead wires within the existing fire limits of the District; makes certain necessary verbal corrections; and inserts a provision imposing a penalty of $25 per day for failure on the part of any gaslight or electric light company to furnish or discontinue any street lamp that the commissioners may direct.

WASHINGTON GARDNER,
EDWARD L. TAYLOR, JR.,
A. S. BURLESON,
Managers on part of the House.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. The only thing I desire is to raise some further points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves all points of order.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want to reserve a point of order to amendment 95.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan, to omit the reading of the report and statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Is it proper for me to make my points of order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I desire to make a point of order to Senate amendments Nos. 102, 151, 157, 161, 207, and 218.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order to amendment 95 on the ground that the item inserted in the conference report was never in dispute between the two Houses, but was inserted as new legislation by the conferees. It is found on page 3561 of the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I make my points of order on the same ground.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Indiana on the point of order.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, on page 3561 of the RECORD of Saturday I find the following:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$260,000," and on page 35 of the bill, in line 24, after the word "specifications," insert the following:

"Provided further, That whenever it shall appear to said commissioners that the work now performed under contract, namely, street sweeping and cleaning alleys and unimproved streets, can, in their judgment, be performed under their immediate direction more advantageously to the District, then, in that event, said commissioners are hereby authorized to perform any part or all of said work in such manner, and to employ all necessary personal services, and purchase and maintain such street-cleaning apparatus, horses, harness, carts, wagons, tools, and equipment as may be necessary for the purpose, and of this appropriation the sum of $40,000 is hereby made immediately available."

To that I make the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that the point of order comes too late. This conference report was under consideration on Saturday last, and the point of order was reserved only as to one item.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Oh, the gentleman reserved all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can dispose of that by suggesting to the gentleman from Wisconsin that this conference report is to be considered without regard to the conference report made on a former occasion, and the gentleman from Indiana did reserve all points of order. The Chair thinks the gentleman is in time with his point of order.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the item inserted in the conference report was never in dispute between the two Houses whatever. It was not in the bill at the time that it passed the House. It was not incorporated at the other end of the Capitol in the Senate, and the Senate amendment comes back here as legislation having its source in the conference committee.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the gentleman does not wish to mislead the House.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] raised the point of order on this item in the House, and it went out on a point of order that he made. It was in the bill when the bill was reported to the House. The Senate put it back in the bill in the Senate committee.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am unable to find where it is incorporated in the bill by the Senate.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. If the gentleman will read the original bill he will find it there.

Mr. BURLESON. It is only fair to state that it went out in the Senate on a point of order raised by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] to state that this matter has been inserted by the conferees in the bill at a point in the text where there was nothing in dispute. The gentleman from Michigan states that this item was in the House bill, but it went out on a point of order; that the Senate committee put it in the bill in the Senate, and it went out there on a point of order. It was in the bill when it went to conference and never in disagreement. The conferees inserted the provision in the conference report. Of course, that is clearly beyond their power.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires on this point of order to get at the exact matter covered by the point, and will direct the Clerk to read the proviso in the original bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That whenever it shall appear to the commissioners that said latter work can not be done under their immediate direction at 19 cents or less per thousand square yards, in accordance with the specifications under which the same was last advertised for bids, it shall at once be their duty to advertise to let said work under said specifications to the lowest responsible bidder, and if the same can not be procured to be done at a price not exceeding 20 cents per thousand square yards, they may continue to do said work under their immediate direction, in accordance with said specifications, $250,000, and the commissioners shall so apportion this appropriation as to prevent a deficiency therein.

The SPEAKER. Was that matter in conference?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; only the amount of that item was in conference.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the gentlemen of the House that we do not question but what this is subject to a point of order. We do claim, without any division of sentiment in the committee, either in the House or the Senate, that it ought to be in the bill. It was in the House bill and was stricken out on a point of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN]. Just a few moments ago Mr. CARLIN came to me and said that he wanted to speak on this matter, but he had an engagement and had waited as long as he could. He said to me, in effect, that he desired to withdraw every particle of objection that he had to the item, and further stated that he believed it ought to be in the bill and that he authorized me to say that for him. Now, it went over to the Senate, and the Senate committee put it in the bill, and then, on a point of order raised by a Senator, it went out of the bill. Now, from as reputable authority, as I have the statement of the gentleman from Virginia, I can state that the Senator who objected said that he did not understand the matter or he would not have been in favor of striking it out and that he wished it might be retained. These statements coming to the conferees, we believed that we acted in harmony with the thought of the House—of both Houses—in leaving the matter in the bill, although we do say, and there is no disposition to say otherwise, that technically it is subject to a point of order.

But whether a technicality should stand for what we all believe to be for the best interest of the District is the question for the House to determine.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Assuredly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I got the opinion some way, I believe while the bill was going through the House, that this work for cleaning and sweeping the streets was let out by contract to the highest bidder. Is that true?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. A part of it in this way, I may say to the gentleman. There has been for years, ever since I have been on this committee, for 10 years, more or less complaint every year at the way the street sweeping was done. They are now performing a good part of the work, and the commissioners have gradually increased the paraphernalia necessary to do the work under appropriations made for that purpose by the House; and they have now a very considerable amount of machinery that can be used for cleaning snow and ice, for cleaning the streets and flushing the streets, and a good deal of this, I am informed, will have to be housed and unused if this item stays out of the bill.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield in that connection? Is this true—I have seen it, if I mistake not, in a newspaper—that one of the Commissioners of the District, I believe Commissioner Johnston, I am not sure, bought without any authority of law or without any authority, a large number of street-cleaning apparatus? Is that true; and that it has never been put in use; and if that be true, is not that the very purpose of this amendment in the conference report to utilize that machinery?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. If there was any machinery bought without authority of law I am not aware of it. There was an item in the bill a year ago appropriating $8,000 for the purchase of machinery, open and aboveboard, known by everybody who was giving attention to the bill.

Mr. CARY. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Assuredly.

Mr. CARY. Is it not a fact that Mr. Johnston has ordered 16 machines for street cleaning purposes, and he has them now stored in a barn or a stable loft in the District here, and that 10 of them were charged against the street cleaning department, and 6, I believe, against snow and ice? I placed those charges before the President of the United States and the only answer I got is that they are not paid for yet. That is the only answer, "that they are not paid for yet." If he ordered them without authority and stored them over there, it seems to me this clause in the bill is to permit him now to make use of the appropriation by paying for the machines and have an excuse to say he was right about it when he bought the machines in the first place.

Mr. BENNET of New York. And if the gentleman will permit me, and also that we gave the money to pay for them.

Mr. CARY. Yes; that we gave him the money to pay for them.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It seems to me the important thing is for this House to know whether they are really needed to be bought for the District.

Mr. CARY. They are not needed more than any other items.

The SPEAKER. Are there any further points of order? The Chair is informed that there are a number of precedents relating to this subject. The exact matter which was in difference between the two Houses was as to the amount of money that was to be appropriated for this service, and the point is made that the conferees can not change the text to which both Houses agreed. It is claimed that the text was not in conference, unless the amount of money controlled it, so as to make the agreement of the conferees germane. While it is a safe rule that the conferees can not change the text to which both Houses have agreed, yet if it were an original question, and it were safe to violate a rule of such manifest usefulness, the Chair would be inclined in this specific instance to overrule the point of order, because in each provision in the original bill, and in the provision in the conference report, it is provided that in certain contingencies this work may be done directly by the commissioners. In the precedents relating to this subject it is possible that the substance may sometimes have been sacrificed for the letter; but as the rule in its general application is safe, useful, and necessary, and as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] confesses the point of order, the Chair is inclined, following the precedents, to sustain the point of order. Of course it is in the power of the House to dispose of the matter in any way it chooses.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves to suspend the rules and agree to the report.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] to 20 minutes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this conference report as it now exists for two or three reasons. I still adhere to the original reason that I had, which is that it provides for this increase of the salaries of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. I have been unable to believe that it is necessary for this Congress to increase these salaries, which seem already high, and yet refuse to help those who are lower down in the scale and those who need help. The hearings show that these blind people were given $5,000 10 years ago, and with that money they purchased machinery and purchased such supplies as were necessary so they might support themselves, and it was shown at that time there were about 100 of them in the District that were supporting themselves and keeping away from charity, while on this report our conferees very willingly and anxiously agree to the amendment increasing the salary of the commissioners $1,000 a year and refuse to these people this little help in order that they may support themselves without calling on charity.

I hope that this House will vote down this conference report to-day and send it back again, and keep sending it back even up until 12 o'clock on the 4th day of March, unless we get justice in this report when it does come back to this House.

Mr. SIMS. How much is the appropriation?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. $5,000.

Mr. SIMS. This increase of salary is $3,000?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Maybe they can not take care of all the blind at one time.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against this motion, and for this reason: This report came before this House on the 20th of February, 1911, when, in order to get it into conference, it was necessary to have unanimous consent, at which time the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] made the following stipulation with the House:

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman if he is willing to permit a vote of the House on the increase of the salaries of the District Commissioners?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The District officials?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. The increase of the salary of the District Commissioners.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I think so; I would be willing for the House to vote—

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Without agreeing to it in conference.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Personally I have no objection to the House voting on that.

And then he added some words stating his own personal belief why the increase ought to be made.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Will you read those words?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly. He said:

I want to say to the gentleman, to be entirely frank with him, personally I feel thoroughly convinced that it is the right thing to do. The increase ought to be made.

It was the gentleman's personal idea that a fair increase ought to be made. Of course, I understand that, going into a full and free conference, the gentleman could not make a binding promise, but I also know that in my six years of service here, wherever it has been necessary to get unanimous consent to go into conference and the House has given unanimous consent, the House conferees, as to the manner in which the question has been raised, have always come back to this House with the matter in disagreement and given the House a chance to vote.

Neither the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] nor myself can be affected one way or the other by this, because we will both go out on the 4th of March, but it seems to me that the unvarying practice of conferees, when they have gone as far as the gentleman from Michigan went in a statement, to bring that matter back in disagreement and allow the vote on it ought to be continued. There is no other way the House can get a vote except by voting down the entire conference report, and that, in the closing days of the session, particularly, is hard. I do not think the salary of these commissioners ought to be increased, but beyond that, I think when the conferees get unanimous consent by a statement to the House, in which the House has the right to believe, that if they go into conference they will bring the matter back into disagreement, at least once, that that is a higher matter, and much higher, than a paltry increase to the commissioners, and justifies any man to vote against the rule or a conference report, which I intend doing.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Michigan use some more of his time?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, addressing myself to the street-cleaning paragraph, which seems to be the subject in controversy, I desire to make just a short statement as to the necessity of this legislation at this time.

We have now a large portion of the city under direct District control, so far as street sweeping is concerned, and the bulk of the city is being cleaned under the direct authority of the commissioners. We have a private contract for what might be termed the "fringes" of the city. That contract will have expired before another appropriation bill can be drawn and passed. That contract is for five years. The law authorizing that contract provides that the contract shall be made for not to exceed five years. In order to get any competition at all, the commissioners would have to make a long-time contract, because the contractor could not afford to purchase and maintain equipments on a one-year or two-year contract.

Now, a year ago there was inserted in this appropriation bill, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, a provision providing for the expenditure of $8,000 for the purchase of street-sweeping machinery. Here is the language of it:

Provided further, That not exceeding $8,000 of this appropriation shall be available, when ordered in writing by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, for the purchase of horse-propelled street-washing machines or other machines or apparatus for cleaning streets to be used in connection with hand-cleaning work performed under the immediate direction of said commissioners, and the expenditures on account of this service shall not be charged as a part of the cost of hand-cleaning work.

Under this authority I am informed that the commissioners have expended practically the entire amount of this appropriation in the purchase of street-cleaning apparatus. They are prepared, and will be prepared, if this paragraph becomes a law, to proceed thus economically and properly to use their investment and to clean the streets in a better manner, in my judgment, and in their judgment, than they are cleaned by the contractor.

Now, in order to give an illustration of what this means, I am going to call your attention to a statement made to me a few days ago in regard to these machines. These sweeping machines that are used by the street cleaners of the District cost about $200 or $205 each.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I hope we may have attention in the House on the part of gentlemen who are objecting to those things.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will state to the gentleman that we are discussing that matter over here.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentlemen should listen.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I am perfectly willing, Mr. Speaker, that the gentlemen should not listen unless they desire, but in any event they should keep quiet.

Mr. CARY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. CARY. I want to inquire of the gentleman if that appropriation was not placed there by the Senate last year?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes; I will say to the gentleman that that is true.

Mr. CARY. Flushers and washing machines?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I said washing machines and other apparatus. I know what the gentleman wanted when he lent his assistance in getting this provision put on in the Senate. He was active in that matter because a constituent of his, in his district, is the only man in the United States who makes that particular kind of a washing machine that he hoped would be purchased. But the trouble with the gentleman seems to be that they, the commissioners, did not purchase all of that kind of machines, as was hoped by the gentleman's constituent.

Now, then, I want to make this statement to the House: Not long ago the commissioners had a desire to use one of the sweeping machines that was owned by the private contractor—desired to use it for a certain specific purpose, and as I am informed, and I have no doubt my information is correct, when they went to the contractor and asked that they be permitted to use one of these machines, he said, "It will cost you $18 a day to use that machine because that is my profit per machine under my contract." Think of it—$18 a day for the use of a machine costing $205! It seems to me it would be better if we should use our 16 machines and save that profit to the District and to the Nation.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is not a fact that when this item was before the House the last time the statement was made that the street cleaning here in the city of Washington is let out on contract?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. A portion of it is let out on contract.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What proportion of it? Give us the proportion, approximately.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. A great majority of the streets and avenues are now cleaned by the District Commissioners directly, and the rest, mostly in the outskirts, are cleaned by contract.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Then the gentleman will say that as much as 40 per cent is done by contract?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I will say that less than half is done by contract.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Now, Mr. Speaker, in my short time I will say that Mr. CARLIN, of Virginia, made a point of order against this provision in the House bill, but since that time some examination into the matter has been made by him, as I am informed, and he has authorized the statement that he not only does not desire that the item should go out, but he is anxious that it should go in, because he has investigated it. And I will say further that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], who moved that the matter go out in the Senate, has since investigated the question, and he has given his consent that this should be put in by the conferees. The conference committee of the House has acted in good faith, and has made an earnest effort to see that the largest use possible of the machinery for the cleaning of the streets is made. I am sure that private interests, with reference to constituents in any man's district, should not intervene here when it comes to a question of expending the funds of the people of this District and the funds of the people of the country at large who pay one-half the expenses of this District. [Applause.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to one hour.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If agreeable, Mr. Speaker, we may perhaps come to some terms by which we can adjust this matter if the motion to suspend the rules be set aside and the House is given a chance to vote directly on the increase of salaries to the commissioners. So far as I am concerned, I would be disposed to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When the matter was before the House the last time the House struck out an appropriation to establish a reformatory at a point near Mount Vernon.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the meaning of this section, beginning on page 104, line 16, and running clear through to the bottom of page 108?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am unable to answer the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I want to say that with this arrangement which the gentleman suggests the gentleman from Michigan would have an hour to explain these items.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask if it is not true that the language of lines 16, 17, and 18, on page 104, "for the following purposes in connection with the removal of the jail and workhouse prisoners from the District of Columbia to the site acquired for a workhouse in the State of Virginia"——

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is not in question at all.

Mr. BURLESON. I think I can explain to the gentleman from Wisconsin. That is at Occoquan, and does not refer to the reformatory.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Occoquan?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is for the workhouse at Occoquan. The item the gentleman referred to was for a reformatory near there and not the workhouse.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then this has nothing to do with the reformatory?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand, then, that under this bill no reformatory can be established within 10 miles of Mount Vernon?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I think we can adjust this matter. If the gentleman will withdraw his motion to suspend the rules and agree to the conference report and give us a direct vote on the salaries of the commissioners——

Mr. MANN. There will have to be a direct vote on the conference report first. If you should reject the conference report, then you could get a vote on any specific amendment.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not like that way.

Mr. BURLESON. The motion to suspend the rules can be withdrawn and the point of order can be withdrawn, and then the gentleman from Illinois can make a motion to recommit with instructions that the salaries be reduced.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I suppose it could be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. But you must first dispose of the conference report. If you reject the conference report, you can give any reasons you want to. Then any amendment of the Senate is before the House for such disposition as the House sees fit to make of it.

Mr. SIMS. But the conference report is already rejected by the point of order being sustained.

Mr. MANN. I understand the proposition now is for the motion to suspend the rules to be withdrawn, the point of order to be withdrawn, so as to bring the conference report before the House, and discuss the questions that are really in issue instead of technical questions that nobody cares anything about.

Mr. SIMS. And by unanimous consent you attempt to set aside the action of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. To withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. But it has already been acted on, and you will have to set aside the action of the Chair.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to any request such as is made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but the gentleman from Illinois did not make the request; it was the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to attack this conference report as a whole. I do not intend to criticize gentlemen on the conference committee, but I am perplexed to know why the House conferees insisted on striking out the Senate amendment, which was the only good amendment to the bill. I refer to the Senate amendment appropriating $5,000 for the aid of the blind for the Polytechnic Institute. It does seem to me that if any class of American citizens could appeal to the generosity of Congress and to the intelligence of Members of this House, it would be those who are so unfortunate as not to be able to see the light of day. When the Senate amended this bill restoring an appropriation which has heretofore been carried, as I understand, of $5,000—and if it has not been heretofore carried, it ought to have been carried—why the House conferees insisted on striking it out is beyond my comprehension. Since this legislation has been initiated in the Senate, legislation founded in sympathy, justice, and wisdom, I am not in favor of sustaining any conference report that strikes it out. I believe it ought to remain in the bill. I believe those people, numbering about 100 unfortunates, who have been sustaining themselves with the aid of $5,000 from the Government, ought to be encouraged to continue to sustain themselves. They ought to be encouraged to put forth such efforts as people in their condition can reasonably put forth to protect themselves from becoming objects of charity. I regret very much that the House conferees struck that provision out of the bill, and because they did I shall vote against the adoption of the conference report. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I am not in favor of legislating by way of appropriation bills, but if there ever was a time for so doing in the interest of District business that time is at hand.

I desire to say, in justice to my associates upon the District Committee, that, in my judgment, there is no committee in this House, no committee of the Sixty-first Congress, that has been more willing to convene and do business than has the Committee upon the District of Columbia. It has seemed to the chairman of that committee, especially during the last session, that it was not possible to call that committee together at any time of the day, in the forenoon or the afternoon, or even in the evening, when the committee was not willing to respond. As a result, this committee has reported about 60 bills which I hope will be enacted into law before this Congress concludes its labors. Beginning with about the middle of last May, the District Committee of the House, before whom some of the matters in this bill would naturally come, have been denied, as all know, the right that is due it under the rules of the House to present its legislation; and as a result, since the middle of last May this committee has had only one legislative day and three hours of another day. It has therefore been impossible to even dispose of the bills which the committee has reported and which are upon the calendar at this time. It is for this reason, in justification of myself and in justification of the other members of the committee who may feel as I do, that I have spoken as I have with reference to the business of the District.

There is another thing that I desire to call attention to, and that is this: On Saturday last, when this conference report was under consideration, the suggestion was made by some Member of the House that the legislation with reference to the asphalt plant was brought before the District Committee. That is a mistake.

The asphalt bill was never introduced, and it is due to the commissioners to say why. They recognize, as have Members of the District Committee for months, that it was useless to introduce such legislation, because the committee, even though it were willing to make a report on the legislation to the House, was continually denied the right under the rules to present its legislation to the House.

I am in favor of this legislation in the conference report for another reason. I am informed by one of the Commissioners of the District that this street-cleaning proposition will save the District $40,000 a year after the first year, and, as I understand it, this is the year when they let the contracts, and it is a contract running over a period of five years. It does seem to me that the House ought to adopt this conference report. It is true there may be some things in it that are objectionable, but as I have said before, this is what I offer in justification of my position at this time in support of this conference report.

I want to say to the House that since I have been a Member of this committee I have had but one purpose, and that was to pass legislation in the interest of the people of the District, and by so doing in the interest of all the people, for this is the Capital City of our Nation. I hope this conference report will be adopted by more than a two-thirds vote. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the controversy here is over the compensation of the Commissioners of the District, and in order to afford the House an opportunity to pass on that I ask unanimous consent that all proceedings on the conference report be vacated, and that the conference report be disagreed to. That will leave the Senate amendments then to be considered by the House. It will save time and expedite business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the only thing at issue in fact is the salary of the commissioners.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As far as we can ascertain.

Mr. COX of Indiana. That is really the bone of contention.

The SPEAKER. Then will the gentleman modify his request, that all proceedings touching the consideration of the conference report be vacated, and that the conference report be rejected, and that all amendments of the Senate be disagreed to save the amendments specified, namely, touching the salaries of the commissioners, and that that be disposed of by a vote of the House?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, by a majority vote?

The SPEAKER. Oh, certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say just a word.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. Will this vacate the ruling of the Chair on the point of order on the report?

The SPEAKER. It vacates everything.

Mr. SIMS. So that it will not hereafter come up. Now, would the unanimous consent vacate——

The SPEAKER. It vacates all proceedings touching this conference report. It insists on its disagreement to all amendments of the Senate save the one, namely, touching the salary of the commissioners.

Mr. SIMS. I just did not want the Chair overruled on that point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The only thing now before the House is the disposition of the amendment touching the salaries of the commissioners, and the Clerk will report the same.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. In this unanimous-consent agreement, which has just been entered into, what becomes of the amendment that the conferees reported and that the gentleman from Indiana made a point of order on?

The SPEAKER. The Chair overruled that point of order, but that now, by unanimous consent, is wiped out and the conference report is rejected, and the House by unanimous consent further insists on all its disagreements to all the Senate amendments except Senate amendment which is as follows. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that part, but there will have to be another conference report, and I am trying to guard against the future if possible. The gentleman from Indiana stated awhile ago he would withdraw the point of order. Now——

Mr. MADDEN. He has.

Mr. MANN. Suppose they bring in another conference report that has the same thing in it. Then we would have to go through the same minutia again.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I did make that statement, that if this agreement could be brought about so as to give the House a direct vote on the increase of the salaries of the commissioners, that as far as I was personally concerned I would withdraw the point of order which I waged a moment ago against amendment No. 95.

Mr. MANN. And probably would not renew it?

Mr. COX of Indiana. And I will say frankly I will not renew it in the future against amendment 95 if——

Mr. MANN. But some other gentleman might.

Mr. SIMS. Then bring in a report that is not subject to these points of order, and the gentleman will not have any trouble.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman submit?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. This motion has to do with the increase of the commissioners' salaries.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move to recede from his disagreement to the amendment which the Clerk will report?

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment numbered 1, page 2, line 4, strike out "five" and insert "six."

Mr. BURLESON. Amendments numbered 1, 2, and 3 are on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the unanimous consent goes to the amendments which involve the increase of the commissioners' salary.

Mr. BURLESON. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment numbered 2, page 2, line 5, after "commissioners," insert "one thousand."

Amendment numbered 3, page 2, line 6, strike out "five" and insert "six."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan submit a motion?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House recede and concur in these Senate amendments.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, no one likes to have his good faith or sincerity questioned on the floor of this House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] has twice referred to a semiagreement to refer this to a vote. The other day a motion was made, not by myself, but by another, to suspend the rules and adopt the report. I am not now, nor have I been at any time, averse to submitting this motion to the House. I do feel that every Member of this body ought to vote for this amendment increasing the salaries of the commissioners to $6,000 a year. They earn it. For 30 years they have had $5,000. Originally it was fixed precisely on the basis of the congressional salary. Our salaries have been increased to $7,500, and we only ask $6,000 as a compromise.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMS. Do these commissioners have to incur the necessary expenses of election and a campaign every two years as a Member of Congress does? Why compare them with us? There is no comparison between us?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman that the most expensive part of my congressional career has been during my period of residence in this city and meeting the expenses that are made necessary in a moderate way for myself and my family. I have lived modestly all the time—and I am not ashamed to state it—and I never saved a dollar out of my salary at $5,000 a year when my family and myself were here. It has taken everything. What little we have saved we have saved since it was raised to $7,500 and when we have been at home studying and practicing economy there.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman have no campaign expenses to meet every two years?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. These gentlemen live here 12 months in the year. They are compelled by virtue of their positions to maintain an establishment such as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] nor I could not afford to maintain on the salary which we receive now. They owe something to this city of 300,000 people by virtue of their position. They are the official representatives of the entire city. They are visited by official representatives from other cities in every part of the country. They must of necessity show certain courtesies by virtue of the public position they occupy. These courtesies entail expense, and these expenses must be paid either out of their salary or out of their private income. I believe that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and that these gentlemen are entitled even to a moderate salary, enough, if we can make it so, to meet their individual expenses.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] first.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman says that the salaries of these commissioners was originally as much as ours. Does not the gentleman know and is he not aware of the fact that every Member of this House is compelled every two years to be subjected to campaign expenses, more or less, in order to hold his position here, which expenses these commissioners under no circumstances have to pay?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is true. Some gentlemen have to spend, I am told, in a single campaign more than they get in the two years for which they are elected, which is an unfortunate thing if it is true, but that does not justify the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SIMS. I know; but is it not a fact that there are expenses that are legitimate and unavoidable connected with every campaign where a man has political opposition or opposition in his own party for nomination which these commissioners do not have to incur?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Granting that, they have many other expenses which are an offset, and more, too, to those which would arise out of campaign expenses properly conducted.

Mr. SIMS. Does not the gentleman think that the dignity of his office here is as great as that of a commissioner? And does not the gentleman have to spend money on account of his office in Washington that he otherwise would not have to spend?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SIMS. I do not see that we have any advantage of them in the way of expenditure by residence in Washington.

Mr. BUTLER. Do the duties of the commissioners require their constant attention?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Every hour in the day. No three men in this District work harder than the District Commissioners.

Mr. BUTLER. They have no opportunity, then, to do any other work except the work involved in that office?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I am glad the gentleman raised that question. The chairman of the board of commissioners, and I have this on authority, after a few days in the office, ceased to take his lunch out, and now takes it in the office, and goes there in the morning and stays there until night constantly on duty. He ordered his private desk in his place of business to be wrapped up and to be put in a loft until he gets through as commissioner. He has absolutely abandoned his private business.

Mr. OLMSTED. So as to be on duty all the year?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. One of the commissioners has abandoned a business of long standing here?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. He has been compelled to abandon his private business?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; he has been compelled to abandon his personal attention to it.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. I will say to the gentleman that we pay to our gas commissioners and tax commissioners and electrical commissioners $7,500 a year. And let me make another statement in answer to the statement of my friend from Tennessee, that the State of New York limits the campaign expenses of each Member of Congress to $4,000 at each election, and he is pledged to make a sworn statement to that effect, and can not exceed it without danger of having his office vacated.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, we passed the conference report this morning on the legislative appropriation bill, which had added to it after it left this House $106,000 in increase of salaries. We now have under consideration a conference report which carries increases of salaries after it left this House and came back here to the amount of $54,000, making a total in these two bills in the increase of salaries of $160,000. I desire to say that most of these increases have been in salaries that were already large; not in the small salaries of men who are getting $1,000 or less a year, but in the salaries of those who are already getting the larger salaries from this Government.

Now, then, we are asked to recede and agree to an amendment placed in this bill increasing the salaries of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia from $5,000 to $6,000. The law provides that these salaries shall be at $5,000. Before these salaries are increased in this way there ought to be some legislation taken up by the District Committee, increasing, if it is necessary, these salaries and doing it in a regular and orderly way.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to state a fact to the gentleman to help him out. It is this: When the last vacancy occurred, when Mr. Rudolph was appointed, very many good men in the District were anxious to get this position of District Commissioner.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that there has been no difficulty whatever in securing the services of good men, and those who come in always exceed, in the value of the services rendered, those who preceded them; and so far as the qualifications of these men who now hold these important offices are concerned, we have to-day the best men that are to be found anywhere for $5,000 a year.

I think this House ought to fully understand this question—whether we want to go on and increase and increase these salaries which are already high, and yet stand here refusing to increase the salaries of the clerks in the departments, who are getting the small salaries. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a table showing these increases.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to insert a table of the increases. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The table referred to follows:

District of Columbia.

Departments.	Salaries.		Other items.		New items, expenses, other items.	New items in salaries.
	Senate increase.	Senate decrease.	Increase.	Decrease.
Contingent expenses	$10,295	$7,400	$4,750		$3,500	$10,800

Total increase, Senate, salaries, $54,595.
Total increase, Senate, other items, $1,253,190.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, in opposing the motion made by the gentleman from Michigan, I wish to assure the House that it is no personal matter with me. I am unacquainted with any of these commissioners. So far as I know they are able, brave, and fearless men. But I am opposed to the constant and everlasting increase of the salaries of Government officials, especially, Mr. Speaker, of men who are already getting a reasonable salary. It does not appeal to me at all to say that men occupying a certain position in life have great responsibilities thrown upon them and for that reason they should have their salaries increased. I know, as I have said on this floor time and time again, of no law upon the statute books of the United States or upon the statute books of the different States of the Union that compels a man to accept and hold an office. The moment he finds it to be a losing game, so far as the law is concerned, he becomes free to exercise his own free will as he sees fit, and if he is in office solely for the purpose of making money out of it and is losing money at the game, my advice to him would be to abandon it, vacate, and quit. [Applause.]

The argument that the great city of New York pays some of their subordinate officials the enormous salary of $75,000 a year does not appeal to me. Washington City has not a Wall Street in it, nor have the great cities of the country Wall Streets in them. The great city of Indianapolis, the center of the United States, pays its mayor $4,000 a year. He has been drawing that salary to my knowledge for the last 15 or 20 years, and yet, as every election comes around in the city of Indianapolis there is a tremendous struggle to secure the office of mayor.

I have heard the argument advanced here time and time again as to increasing the salaries of these officials because they have such great responsibilities resting upon them; "they must entertain society," and for these reasons a tremendous expense is entailed upon them. I want to say to the Members of this House that the charwomen that clean the public buildings of Washington likewise have society that they must entertain, and yet few and far between do we ever hear a word said in behalf of that older class of public officials in an attempt to get their salaries increased. [Applause.]

As the gentleman from Illinois has well said, this bill went to the other end of the Capitol, and in the way of increase of salaries alone more than $50,000 was added to it. I challenge the statement that no man can read these amendments in the way of increase of salaries added at the other end of the Capitol, that you will find invariably that the increase goes to some man who is already well paid. I quite agree with the gentleman from Michigan that the laborer is worthy of his hire. They have been hired for this job for the last 25 or 30 years at a salary of $5,000. If it has been sufficient, lo, these many years, what has come over us to-day that will justify us in increasing the salaries now? What new conditions have arisen in the last days of this Congress to justify us in increasing the salaries of these public officials?

This conference report has been before the House on two occasions, and the bone of contention is our failure to get a direct vote upon the increased salaries of these officials. I believe in all sincerity that they are paid well enough, and I hope when the vote is taken that the motion made by the gentleman from Michigan will not obtain. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 45 minutes of the hour.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I doubt if ever before in my service here I have spoken against the increase of any salary, but when I find that it is proposed to raise the salaries of the men who perform the duties equivalent to the duties performed by the mayor of the city of New York to a sum $3,000 higher than is given for the execution of those duties in our rich city, it seems to me that the House ought to pay some attention to the increase.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Does the gentleman know that the executive branch of the District government costs about one-third as much as that of any other city of its size in the United States?

Mr. BENNET of New York. If that is so it is a matter of congratulation.

Mr. FORNES. Does not the city of New York pay for the work equivalent to that performed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia as much as $75,000 a year?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No, sir.

Mr. FORNES. If you take the salary of the comptroller and the president of the various boroughs, I think you will find that it adds up, in the aggregate, to that amount.

Mr. BENNET of New York. There are, in addition to the commissioners here, various appropriations for executive officers, but the commissioners are equivalent to the mayor, and it is proposed to raise their salary, in the aggregate, to $18,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Does your mayor inspect the sewers?

Mr. BENNET of New York. He makes some report upon them.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Does he inspect the schools?

Mr. BENNET of New York. He makes, as I say, some report on them. During his term of service Mayor Gaynor has reported on such matters.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. He is the executive head, and these commissioners are both the executive head and have other duties to perform.

Mr. BENNET of New York. There are inspectors to do that work.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Does the mayor of New York have to do anything that requires an engineer's education?

Mr. BENNET of New York. He has to have very considerable engineering qualities in order to get elected.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is true, and that is the kind of quality that the engineering commissioner of the District does not have, but he is an engineer of great ability and does oversee all of the engineering work of the city.

Mr. BENNET of New York. And the mayor of the city of New York, of course, has to spend considerable money to be elected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In order to be fair, is it not true that the work in the great city of New York is subdivided and turned over to bureau chiefs whose salaries would be in excess of those paid the Commissioners of the District of Columbia?

Mr. BENNET of New York. So it is here. There are bureau chiefs and inspectors, and I want to say to the gentleman from Philadelphia, also a great city, that this particular matter of increasing the salaries of these commissioners was introduced into this House in the regular way, in a bill referred in the regular way to the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which committee he is a member, and I want to ask him whether his Committee on the District of Columbia has reported in favor of increasing the salaries of these commissioners?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can only speak for myself, and I would say that I was entirely in favor of increasing these salaries on the basis of merit.

Mr. BENNET of New York. But the committee has not done it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask another question. In the city of Philadelphia, which the gentleman concedes is a great city, we have five departments under the mayor, the mayor receiving $12,000 a year and these department directors receiving $10,000 a year. Under these department heads are the chiefs of bureaus, to whom the work of engineering or of a special character is distributed, and very few of them receive less than five or six thousand dollars a year. I was wondering whether when the gentleman spoke of Washington being the equivalent of his great city of New York, the greatest in this country, with a population in excess of 4,000,000 people, he was not rather overstating his comparison in referring to a city the size of which in population is not greater, perhaps, than that of the congressional district represented by the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman did not catch my comparison. I said that the office held by the three commissioners was equivalent to the mayoralty of the city of New York, not that the work done by them was equivalent to that done by the executive department of the city of New York.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Just one more question. Is it not a fact that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia do very largely this specialized bureau work that is assigned in the large cities to separate branches of the government?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, a conclusive answer to the gentleman is this: If the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which he is a member and which has the charge of legislation increasing the salaries of these commissioners, think they ought to have a larger salary, let them report out the bill. Do not let them get it on an appropriation bill without a hearing, without going before the proper committee, without going before a committee where we can ask them about their work in connection with the snow removal, which has been criticized——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows that sundry efforts have been made to get these bills before the House, and that those efforts have failed.

Mr. BUTLER. But why have not you reported the bill?

Mr. BENNET of New York. And, furthermore, where we could ask them in connection with such things as the letter of the Attorney General of the United States, who wrote to Mr. Wendell that the smoke ordinance, which is of importance to the health of the city, was not being enforced, and that the District Commissioners ought to be prodded up. On top of their failure to remove the snow, on top of the charges in connection with taxation, without a word of explanation, these men come before us and ask for an increase of $1,000 a piece. What reason is given except that it costs them a good deal more to live? Let them live on less, then, unless they are willing to go before the proper committee of Congress and give an explanation of why they ask this increase in salary.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the government of the District in Washington is unique. There may be in other cities of the country smaller in size a similar form of government under the commission form of government, but there is no city, to my knowledge, of the size of Washington that has the present form of commission government. It is not necessary for me to direct the attention of this body to the fact that in no city of the country have the administrators of the government been vested with as large control over its administration and particularly over legislation as here in Washington. The commissioners are not only the administrative branch of the government, but they largely take the place of the legislative branch, which enacts the legislation that is necessary for the government of this District.

Any Member who is acquainted with the District legislation which comes before this body knows that most of the legislation, if not all, is first submitted to the District Commissioners, and upon their visé it passes through this Chamber. Instance has been directed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to salaries paid to department chiefs in Philadelphia, where, under the Bullitt law, the old form of government was changed, and instead of a common council, in vogue in many cities, performing administrative duties, those administrative duties and responsibilities were vested upon five executive heads at salaries of $10,000 each. It may be true that we can get men at less salaries, but the question is whether these men who are now filling the offices here are capable men of the value of $6,000. No suggestion of any wrongdoing or incapacity or inattention to duties has been made in regard to the present commissioners. It is admitted that under the commission form of government now existing here in Washington we have one of the best governments that can be found anywhere. One of these commissioners—the engineer commissioner—is acknowledged to be a man of ability in his special line. It was my pleasure when he was district engineer in Milwaukee to have frequent meetings with him concerning the engineering work at Milwaukee. It has been universally acclaimed since his coming here two years ago that he has made good, and Maj. Judson, as well as the other commissioners, with whom I am not acquainted, I believe are entitled to receive $6,000, so that they may be honored in a slight way for the excellent work that they are doing for this Government. During this session of Congress and in prior sessions I have scanned in my leisure moments the legislation that has been reported, and I wish to say the recommendations of the present commissioners are much superior to those who have gone before.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. For a short question.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Is the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia an Army officer?

Mr. STAFFORD. He is.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Is he a graduate of West Point?

Mr. STAFFORD. He is.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. He has been educated then by the people of the United States for the public service?

Mr. STAFFORD. He has.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. And draws his pay to which his rank entitles to him?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I concede all that, but he is located here in the city of Washington where his expenses are much greater and where he is performing every minute of the day a great work. We have also Army engineers engaged in the same character of work down on the Canal Zone who are being paid $17,000, ten or twelve thousand dollars in excess of their pay under the Army, and yet the gentleman himself would not say, although they are in the regular corps of the Army, that they should not receive additional pay for the additional responsibility cast upon them. This District Engineer is performing more work, added work, and I do not think the gentleman himself will contend for a moment that this District Engineer Commissioner is not a man who has not made in every way an exemplary record which would entitle him, as well as these other commissioners, to the increase of $1,000.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the position of District Commissioner is a position of great honor, and there is not a man in the District of Columbia that is not anxious to secure the appointment. And the honor alone is sufficient to induce any man to occupy the place, and to seek it, and there is always a scramble for appointment to these places.

The District Commissioners are not called upon to do all this detail work that has been described. They have several assistant commissioners, and these assistant commissioners are the men who understand the details of the work of governing the District. And I want to say to you from personal knowledge that when information is sought to be obtained about what is to be done, and how to be done, and when to be done, and where, the assistant commissioners are the men who possess the information upon which action can be taken.

We have bureau chiefs in the District similar to bureau chiefs in every great city government in the country. We have a superintendent of police, who has jurisdiction over the police department; we have a chief of the fire department, who controls the action of that great body; we have a commissioner of health, who is charged with the responsibility of looking after the sanitary conditions of the District; we have a superintendent of sewers, who looks after the construction of sewers; we have a man in charge of the extension of the water system of the District; we have a superintendent of buildings, whose duty it is to see that the buildings are erected in accordance with the laws of the District. We have inspectors in every branch of the city government, charged with the responsibility of seeing that the details of the work are properly carried forward. We have a corporation counsel charged with the responsibility of seeing that things are done in accordance with the law. We have a city architect who is charged with the responsibility of seeing that plans for public buildings are drawn in the way in which they should be drawn. We have a man, in fact, who is supposed to be an expert, in charge of every bureau of the government of the District of Columbia, and the Commissioners are not overloaded with the work which comes to them by reason of their appointment to this office.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield to one question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Who is responsible for all these bureau chiefs, superintendents, and commissioners? Who are held accountable for them?

Mr. MADDEN. The commissioners have the power to appoint these men, and I regret it. I regret that the appointment to every place within the jurisdiction of the commissioners is made as the result of political pull instead of as the result of merit, found by examination; and no such increase of salaries would be reported from the other end of this Capitol were it not for the fact that every man whose salary is to be increased is upon the pay roll on account of political pull. That is the difficulty.

As a matter of course, if the commissioners are good to people who want places and do, as the result of these appointments, increase the expenses of the city government, why, it is the most natural thing on earth that recommendations should be made for an increase of the salaries of the men who are good to the people who want the places.

I served on the Committee on Appropriations for four years, and on the subcommittee in charge of this bill, and I never voted for an increase of any man's salary or for an increase of any place which did not appeal to me as necessary for the proper conduct of the government of the District of Columbia. These commissioners could afford, because of the prominence and honor which is conferred upon them by reason of their appointment, to serve free of cost, and they would be glad to do it. The mere fact that they would be called upon by reason of their appointment to do social work is no reason for an increase in their salaries. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman speaks of the social distinction and honor attached to the position of Commissioner of the District of Columbia——

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not the position of Member of Congress an honorable place?

Mr. MADDEN. I hope it is.

All the men who occupy these great places as commissioners are rich, and they are appointed because of the influence that is exerted by the rich people of the District, not because of any special qualification which they have for the performance of the duties which come under their charge as Commissioners of the District, and I hope we will not vote to increase their salaries. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I heartily favor increasing the salaries of the District Commissioners. It is true, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that two of the commissioners are wealthy men——

Mr. MADDEN. Surely they are——

Mr. BURLESON. But the other commissioner, the engineer commissioner, if he is a man of wealth it is news to me, and I am quite sure it will be news to him, if such information is brought to him.

Mr. Speaker, it is only fair to state that the movement for an increase of these salaries did not originate with the District Commissioners. These gentlemen did not come before the Committee on Appropriations requesting this increase. The matter was brought to our attention by the taxpayers of the District of Columbia, who will pay one-half of the increase if same is granted. Representatives from the two great commercial organizations of this city—the board of trade and the chamber of commerce—consisting of the largest taxpayers in the city, came before the subcommittee having charge of the preparation of this bill and urged that these salaries be increased to $7,500 per annum.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman give way for a moment?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. FISH. I would like to ask the gentlemen why those taxpayers did not come before the proper committee when this question was up before the District Committee?

Mr. BURLESON. I think they did come before the proper committee. They came before the only committee from which they thought they could secure relief. I do not want to be diverted from the issue before the House to a discussion of the failure on the part of the District Committee to act in this matter. We all know that the District Committee has been able to secure action on but few bills at this session of Congress. The citizens of the District of Columbia knew the situation here as we know it, and, consequently, desiring that something be done, they brought the matter before the Committee on Appropriations. But, Mr. Speaker, all this has no bearing upon the issue under discussion.

I want to call attention to the fact that the salary of the District Commissioners was fixed in 1879 at $5,000. At that time this was a city of 177,000 inhabitants. At that time the annual expenditures of this city amounted approximately to $3,200,000. Since that time the city has increased to a city of 350,000 inhabitants, and its expenditures have increased to over $12,000,000 for each fiscal year. The responsibility for the expenditure of this vast sum of money rests upon the shoulders of the three men appointed by the President of the United States as District Commissioners, and I challenge any Member of this House to name any officer of this Government who is called upon to expend and who is made responsible for the expenditure of $12,000,000 a year who is paid so small a salary as is paid to these District Commissioners.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] says they are given assistant commissioners to aid them. If there is any such office as "assistant commissioner" in this District government I have never heard of it. They are given subordinates, just as subordinate officials are found in the government of every other city of the United States, but I venture to say that there are fewer subordinates of the higher class in the government of the District of Columbia than in the government of any other city of like size in the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman from Texas know that they have two assistant engineer commissioners, Army officers?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, yes; there is no question about that. We have two assistant engineers. They are assistant engineers rather than assistant commissioners, and they are called "engineer commissioners" only because they are employed under the engineer commissioner's department.

Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to say that the city of Washington, in the conduct of its municipal affairs, is as free from graft and corruption and enjoys as economical administration of its affairs as any city in the United States, and no little credit for this is due to the character of men who now hold and have held the office of commissioner. I would be only too glad to institute a comparison between the administration of municipal affairs in the city of New York, or the city of Philadelphia, or the city of Indianapolis with that of the city of Washington. I venture the assertion that if we could get at the actual cost of administration of the city of New York we would find that the amounts paid there for administration are out of all proportion to what is being paid to the District Commissioners.

I will venture the assertion that if we could get at the cost of the executive department of the city of Philadelphia we would find that that city expends $10 for every $1 that is expended for the same purpose in the city of Washington. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I want to say what I said at the time the bill was before the House in Committee of the Whole—that the committee, after careful investigation of the merits of this salary increase, were in favor of it and believed it just to appropriate for it. As my colleague from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] has said, this salary was fixed at $5,000 in the year 1879, at which time Congressmen then received the same salary. But I do not want to present this case upon the basis that because we have raised our own salaries we ought to raise these. My earnest desire is to fix the compensation for public servants commensurate with the services performed, and $6,000 to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, it seems to me, is not too large a salary for the services that they perform for the District government and the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, remarks have been made by the gentleman from Illinois and others intimating that two of the commissioners are men of means. I am informed that they are guilty of this most heinous offense, and have accumulated some money for themselves by honorable and legal means. But do we want to leave the salary one that will make the office acceptable only by men of means? Are we to consider a man's private means when considering his public service to the people? Many Members of this House, and a good many Members of the United States Senate, who regularly step up to the Sergeant at Arms' desk and draw $7,500 in salary, do it regardless of their private means.

Now, Mr. Speaker, speaking of one commissioner who is so fortunate as to be poor, the Engineer Commissioner of the District, let me tell you what we are paying him now out of the revenues of the District: One hundred dollars per year, and the General Government pays him another $100 because his salary and allowance as major in the Engineer Corps bring his income up to about $4,800 of the $5,000 salary allowed by law. Therefore we are only increasing his salary for the extra services that he is performing as commissioner and engineer to a sum total of $1,200.

I want to call attention to one other fact, and that is that this man earns his salary two or three times a year in the splendid engineering work which he is bringing to a final fruition under his jurisdiction. There are two other engineers under assignment, both able engineers, one of them Maj. Cosby, some eight or nine years Maj. Judson's junior, who is Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds attached to the White House, and he has a salary allowed by law of $6,000 per year, $1,000 more than Maj. Judson receives, without, I am sure, the same responsibility. There is another major still more years his junior, Maj. Cavanaugh, attached to the Rivers Board by special assignment under a special act of Congress, and he receives during his time of assignment a salary larger than that of Maj. Cosby. Therefore we are not doing an unusual thing in giving a man, even if he be an Army officer and a ward of the Government in his youth, a little extra money for performing for people of the District and the people of the country at large such splendid services a small compensation in the sum of $1,200 more than he would be allowed if detailed to regular work as an engineer officer of the Army, without the tremendous responsibility that he has as commissioner of this District.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that, in the case of Maj. Judson or any other officer of equal rank, it is a financial loss to him to be engineer commissioner of the District?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The gentleman is entirely correct, and I was coming to that. I know that Maj. Judson, while a soldier, could not do other than to assume the duties assigned to him by the President of the United States, very much regretted that he was called upon to come here, solely on account of the financial loss and the added expense in which he would be involved, without any added compensation therefor.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, a few years ago President Roosevelt appointed Mr. Reynolds to make a study for a proper government here, and Mr. Reynolds reported a scheme of government under which you would have a governor or mayor or one head with a lot of subordinates. That head was to get $10,000 a year, and that proposition was fought tooth and toenail by the District Commissioners and by the people here generally without one word about the salaries not being sufficient then, and they showed and claimed, and I think satisfactorily so, that they had the best service that any city had in the United States and were paying less for it. Now, when Mr. Roosevelt proposed to change this form of government why were not these gentlemen then in favor of it, by which a governor or a mayor would receive $10,000 a year.

Then, there is another thing. Nobody pays any tax in this city on personal property—intangible. Bonds, stocks, money by the millions go untaxed. Put this on if you want to, and put a personal tax on these untaxed millions that men have made in other States, and who have come here to live to avoid paying taxes in performing their duties as good citizens in those States where they made this money. Increase your taxable resources by putting the intangible property on the list, and then increase your salaries and pay the increase out of the District revenue and nobody will kick; but as long as you are going to make the people of the United States pay one-half of that increase, I say you, as representatives of the people, had better not too lightly increase the salaries of people of the city where there is not a dollar of taxes paid upon bonds and stocks and money.

GUAM AND PORTO RICO.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address by Commodore George L. Dyer, United States Navy (retired), before the late Mohawk conference on the subject of Guam, and a similar address on the same occasion by Representative PARSONS, of New York, on the subject of Porto Rico.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The addresses referred to are as follows:

[Sixth session, Friday evening, Oct. 21, 1910.]

The CHAIRMAN. Our first address of this evening will be that of Commodore George L. Dyer, of the United States Navy, formerly governor of Guam, who will speak on conditions in that island.

GUAM.

(Address of Commodore George L. Dyer, United States Navy, retired.)

In the discussion of the subject of "Our Dependent Peoples," the very interesting population of Guam, in the Mariana Islands of the western Pacific, and of Tutuila, in the Samoan Islands of the southern Pacific, should not be omitted. Owing to my association with the former I am able to speak of it with a degree of authority. Of Tutuila I know nothing from personal experience. Both depend on the Navy Department for administrative control and both are of service to it as coaling stations of limited development. Some of the problems which American administrators have to deal with in the Philippines are found, in a minor degree, in Guam. The difficulties of their solution, however, are mitigated and their number few. Guam has a homogeneous people, not at all inclined to turbulence. Its small area, comparatively, prevents any attempt, even if desired, to make combinations against established authority. The amusing tale will be remembered of its capture, in 1898, by the cruiser Charleston, then on her way to Manila to the assistance of Admiral Dewey. The Spanish governor sent his aide to express His Excellency's regret that, for lack of powder, he was unable to return the American's salute, ignorant that war had been declared, and thinking that the shooting of the Charleston, at various apparently fortified points in the harbor, was intended for the honors to the Spanish flag.

GEOGRAPHICAL POSITION.

Guam, discovered by Magellan, is the largest and southernmost of the Mariana Islands, which, with the Bonin Islands, form a chain for 1,300 miles south of Japan. The name "Ladrones" (Thieves), usually given to these islands by American and English cartographers, is not used by continental peoples, and is very distasteful to the Islanders. The title Marianas has been officially adopted for all Government publications.

In all that general region of the Pacific, Guam is the sole island possessing the combination of a good harbor and a plentiful supply of potable water at all seasons. Others have one or the other, but not both. It is a central station for ocean cables from the United States, via Honolulu; from Japan; from China, via the Philippines; and from Java, via the Celebes, and Yap in the Pellew Group, 500 miles southwest of Guam. It has a Federal wireless equipment and is also the advanced meteorological station for the very efficient Philippine weather bureau. Owing to its distance from the United States—5,600 miles—its commercial isolation and its political insignificance, little attention is shown to Guam. Much ignorance prevails concerning it among people of very considerable general information. Interest will be livelier when it falls into the hands of the powerful nation nearest to it. In explaining its location I have found it useful to ask my auditors to consider the North Pacific as an ellipse with the Hawaiian Islands at the eastern focus and Guam at the western. Honolulu is 2,200 miles west of San Francisco and Guam is 2,100 miles east of China, the Philippine Islands intervening. Guam is in the same latitude as Jamaica, 13 degrees north, to which, in some respects, it is similar. Our island contains 214 square miles, is 32 miles long, and between 6 and 7 miles wide. Its surface is broken, the northern part being a high plateau, the southern a series of hills, of which the highest is 1,300 feet. In this portion numerous small rivers flow through narrow valleys of great fertility, with hill slopes covered with valuable hardwoods. The tableland before referred to, heavily wooded in some places, is the principal farming section, although the native ranches are scattered throughout the island. Most of the timber lands belong to the United States. Mr. Pinchot was entirely favorable to the request, made during my time, for a dendrological survey. An attempt was also made to enlist the interest of the Geological Survey, traces of minerals having been found in various places.

PEOPLE.

The original population of Malayo-Polynesian has been greatly modified by Caucasian and Filipino blood introduced by American and English whalers, Spanish and American sailors and soldiers, Filipino convicts, Mexican cowboys, and waifs of other nationalities. The result is the Chamorro people of to-day, a sturdy, well-developed, prolific, and fine-looking race, in number about 12,000, with a birth rate which, since the American occupation, has been steadily increasing. They live in nine towns, each of which, except Agana, contains about 500 people. Agana, the capital, contains 8,000. They are all farmers; the officials, the traders, the mechanics, all of whom form but a small class, having their farms also. Each family is self-sustaining. If a native wishes to build a house he gradually collects the materials and then summons his relatives and friends to assist. Each family has its beast of burden—carabao, bullock, or cow—and a two-wheeled cart for the means of transport between town and ranch. According to the remoteness of the farm they fix the number of their visits to town during the week. Saturday always finds them there for the Sunday church services. On Mondays the whole population is up for early mass at 4 o'clock, and off to the ranches before 7. These customs are not allowed to conflict with the school regulations, and families often suffer, willingly, serious inconvenience on this account.

A more universally contented and independent people can scarcely be found. The conditions of their lives are most simple; there is no real poverty. Differences in social advantages are insignificant. Each family has a town and country home; existence goes on with little friction. They are devout and practical Roman Catholics, a gentle, subordinate, cheerful, and lovable race. Hanging over them, however, is the dreadful menace of the earthquake and the hurricane, both of which have scourged them often and both of which will surely come again.

LANGUAGE.

Their language is usually classed as Micronesian. It has a large infusion of Spanish words, much corrupted in pronunciation. The well-to-do class speaks Spanish with fluency, while the poorer class understands it but little. Since the present system of schools was established the native children have gained a very considerable practical knowledge of English, so that the diffusion of that language is now much more general than the Spanish ever was.

ADMINISTRATIVE ORGANIZATION.

For administrative purposes the island is divided into four counties, each represented by a resident native commissioner, appointed by the governor. His powers are confined to police jurisdiction, with authority to try, as justice of the peace, a certain class of criminal cases of minor gravity. The more important cases are tried in the island court, also presided over by a native judge, who sits in Agana. Appeals lie to this court from the justices' courts, and in certain cases from the island court to the court of appeals of the island. The island court is the same as existed under Spanish domination, under the title of court of first instance, and is similar in jurisdiction to the present courts of that name in the Philippines. The court of appeals, as at present constituted, is a creation of my own. Under the Spanish, appeals from the court of first instance in Guam lay to the audiencia in Manila, Guam then belonging to the political division of the Filipinas.

With the entire independence of Guam, under the United States, and in the absence of all regulation by law of Congress, the earlier American governors constituted a supreme court to consist of the governor himself. The time had come and the material was available to form a court of natives, five in all, with an Americanized Spaniard (living permanently in the island and married to a native) as chief justice. This has now been in successful operation for about six years. The people of Guam are not litigiously inclined, and there are few cases which fall outside the justices' court. Crimes of violence are rare. There have been two, possibly three, trials for murder in the last seven years. The ill-defined boundaries of property are the cause of occasional differences, which are usually adjusted without difficulty by the governor. The Spanish law prevails, modified by the decrees, not numerous, of the several governors. Congress has never legislated for Guam, except to include in the appropriation bills certain items for the naval station. The President, in 1899, issued a short Executive order covering the customs tariff for the island, and in 1901 another defining the accountability for insular funds. The last law regulating the tariff between the Philippine Islands and the United States included Guam. These are the only legal restraints emanating from the Government on the action of the island administrator. Neither has the Navy Department issued special regulations to limit or control or advise his course. He is bound to observe the naval regulations, but, as a matter of fact, he is the most independent official I know of and possesses practically the power of a benevolent despot over an absolutely helpless people. I am happy to say, however, that the choice of the Navy Department for governors has usually fallen upon men of elevated purposes and intelligence, each of whom in turn has carried along the work with industry, devotion, and success.

In addition to the judges the other native officials are the island attorney, who is also the prosecuting officer, registrar of lands, deeds, and titles, and the custodian of the commercial register; the island treasurer and assistants; the clerk of the courts; the warden of the jail, who is also the county commissioner of Agana County. The naval surgeons are the sanitary inspectors. The commissioner of schools is an American, as is the collector of customs. The school teachers are both Americans and natives of both sexes. The island officials and all public improvements not made for the efficiency of the naval station as such are paid from the revenues of the island.

REVENUES.

These revenues come from customs duties, licenses, fines, permits, a poll tax, and a land tax. For the purpose all lands are assessed yearly by a board of intelligent natives, whose assessments have given satisfaction to the taxpayers. It was a question whether the imposition of this tax, an American innovation, was an advisable measure. There is a tendency among the natives to abandon their farms and congregate in the towns, depending on Government employment for support. It is the effort of each governor to counteract this, and the land tax, or a portion of it, is often remitted partly on this account.

PRODUCTIONS.

The principal item of export is copra, the dried pulp of the cocoanuts. This is bought up by the Japanese traders, who, until recently, have enjoyed the entire transportation business of the island and consequently have fixed the price in merchandise at the lowest figure which would keep the industry alive. Within two years the Government transports, touching at the island monthly on the outward trip, have been carrying freight for private individuals at reasonable rates. This has reduced the prices of necessaries and affected the price to the natives of copra. Some timber in trimmed logs is exported to Japan, whither all the copra goes, but the amount of the former is insignificant. The natives raise about everything they eat—corn, rice, beans, sugar cane, coffee, cocoa, tobacco, and all the tropical fruits, with the exception of the alligator pear. This exception, also true at that time of the Philippines, as far as my inquiries went, seemed so extraordinary that I endeavored unsuccessfully to discover the reason. Seeds were early secured from Honolulu and the resulting trees are now bearing. To the frequenter of the Tropics the absence of the avocado (alligator pear) is a serious deprivation.

The cultivation of rice was not so extensive as it should have been, large areas suitable for it having been gradually abandoned, necessitating an increase in the quantity imported. It was hoped that the rebuilding of bridges long since destroyed and the extension of good roads into localities favorable to rice cultivation would stimulate its production, and such, I believe, is the case.

There is a small herd of cattle in the island which provides a limited supply of meat, sold twice a week at Agana at a market belonging to the island. The regulations imposed to restrict the depletion of the herd of beef cattle are carefully observed, also the sanitary conditions connected with the slaughter. In addition to the beef cattle there is a large number of carabao, or water buffalo. These are the real working animals. They are occasionally slaughtered for meat, which is very tough. Hogs, goats, and chickens abound, but no sheep. There are a few scrub ponies. Bees have been successfully introduced quite recently.

Strangely enough, no natives follow the pursuit of deep-water fishing, and yet they are very fond of sea food.

At low tide a few men and women wade about the reefs catching shellfish and small fry in the pools and crevices for their own use. As an industry, however, fishing does not exist. To supply the market and to teach the natives, 8 or 10 Japanese fishermen were introduced, with their boats and tackle, and certain inducements offered the natives to engage in the business. Contrary to my hope, however, the Japanese devoted themselves entirely to catching turtles, which, indeed, found ready sale and added a valuable food product. The coast of the island does not offer convenient places for the harboring and launching of boats, although there are a few such. This does not account, however, for the scarcity of native boats. The devotion of the entire population, practically, to bucolic pursuits is one reason, but hardly sufficient to explain why these Pacific Islanders are so little given to aquatic adventure.

The preceding refers entirely to the food products enjoyed by the natives. Some milk is peddled about Agana and, of course, the usual tropical wild food products—breadfruit, banana, guava, mango, etc., are plentiful. In addition to island contributions the American colony has the advantage of supplies brought in the refrigerators of the transports. These are placed at once in the large cold-storage rooms of the naval station ice plant, at the cost of the owner, and distributed during the month intervening before the arrival of the following transport. All the delicacies of the San Francisco market are available at prices not unduly raised by high rates of carriage.

THE AMERICAN COLONY.

This consists of the governor—a naval officer of rank, who is also commandant of the naval station—his aide, and several officers who represent the various bureaus of the Navy Department. There are four or five medical officers, several clerks, hospital attendants, a printer, a plumber, machinists, carpenters, foremen of public works, officers of Marines and their detachment of 100 men, the naval station band, the officers and crew of the station ship, and the cable station staff of 8 or 10 employees. All these, with the families of many, form a usually harmonious society, in which social distinctions are not too carefully drawn and which is sure to contain a diversity of talent sufficient to afford a pretty constant entertainment.

The foreign colony, for intimate social purposes, numbers about 30 people. On general occasions the superior native families participate, and the younger women especially, with their gentle manners and attractive appearance, add a very charming feature, for, be it known, "Butterick's Fashions," the English publication "The Queen," and others similar are common in Guam, and every family possesses a sewing machine.

THE CURRENCY.

We had our troubles with the currency. The first difficulties incident to the reorganization of the island government, then the destruction wrought by an unusually violent hurricane, followed, a year or two after, by a record earthquake, occupied fully the attention of the first American governors in instituting order and in starting the usual activities of life. When I came along the normal course of affairs had been fully reestablished. It was a favorable moment to turn attention to matters of general progress. There were at this time three kinds of currency in use—the United States currency, paid out to the officers and enlisted force, and put in circulation by them; the Mexican dollar, in general use, paid out for labor in connection with the naval station; and the old Spanish-Philippine currency, also in general use, and paid out, with the Mexicans, by the island government for labor and supplies. The two last named has been demonetized in the Philippines and the Spanish-Philippine coin possessed in the outside world only its bullion value. We found that the Japanese traders were buying it up somewhere, presumably in the Philippines, and shipping it to Guam, via Japan, and using it to pay their customs dues. At the same time they were exporting American silver and Mexicans as rapidly as they could accumulate them. The bad money in the island treasury was rapidly increasing and the good disappearing.

It required a radical and arbitrary measure to stop that, and a moment was carefully chosen (when, to the best of our information, the least damage would be inflicted) to interdict the use of the Philippine currency in any transaction in which the island government was interested, such as receipts for customs, payment for salaries, labor, and supplies. This was effective without serious harm to any. There were some cases of loss where there had been hoarding, but as the Spanish-Philippine currency continued in circulation among the traders for some time without a very rapid depreciation no distress occurred. I would have liked to have done the same with the Mexican currency. This has been done since, but it was then in general circulation throughout the East. The "Mexican," while about the size of the American dollar, had only half its value. The natives would not willingly accept as an equivalent for his labor a piece of money half the size of his customary coin, or one of similar size in place of the two he had been used to receiving. The moment to continue the process of simplification was not propitious.

In this connection we were watching with much interest the movement in the Philippines for the establishment of agricultural banks, following the plan of Lord Cromer in Egypt. With a longer tenure of office a bank would have been attempted, but there were so many things requiring immediate attention, with the limited staff of competent assistants at our disposal, it was not possible. It should be done. The exactions of the usurers are great, and the native farmer can hardly be expected to rise above the level which this disability, with others, imposes. A postal savings department in the Federal post office in Guam will be of benefit.

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS.

The Spaniards had constructed a very good road from the harbor 6 miles to Agana, the capital. This the Americans have vastly improved, making necessary fills, deeper cuts, strong cemented stone retaining walls, and better bridges. The road, nearly level throughout, runs along the coast very close to the shore, skirting promontories where feasible, or cutting through them. Deposits of clay mixed with lime, called "cascajo," exist everywhere, and this, laid on a proper foundation, affords a very excellent road material. As a consequence the highways, which are 16 feet wide, are quite equal to the best roads anywhere. Their extension has been going on steadily since the American occupation, and they now reach to remote parts of the island. This has required the construction of numerous bridges and, in the southern part of the island, rather formidable fills. The road mender system prevalent in Europe was inaugurated, a man to a section permanently at work. The anchorage in the harbor is very deep and ships are forced to lie at a long distance from the landing by reason of a shelf of coral sand and rock which forms a sort of rim about the harbor, varying in width, covered to a depth of about 3 feet at high water. This shelf has pockets or wells in it here and there, between which a rough sort of channel had been cleared to allow boats of light draft to pass across at half tide. It was very evident that a channel available for lighters at all stages of the tide was a necessity. This was undertaken immediately. We had a very rough equipment to start with—a scoop road scraper attached to a hemp rope hauled toward an anchored scow by a hand winch fixed upon it, and later a power winch and wire rope. With the occasional use of dynamite, a force of 20 natives, under Chief Carpenter Johnson, of the Navy, who worked in the water with them, keeping them steadily at it, part of the time at night, in just one year made a channel 50 feet wide about 1 mile long, and 4 feet deep at low water. We were then certain of our frozen supplies, particularly the meat, which, in prechannel days, under the tropical sun, had been several times detained in shallow places on the way from the transports to the shore, until rendered unfit for consumption. This channel has since been made deeper and kept clear by a regular modern suction dredge sent out at my earnest solicitation, followed up by that of my successors.

Another improvement of great value was the placing of buoys to mark the entrance to, and the submerged dangers in, the harbor, and particularly the mooring buoys, each fastened to a bridle of very heavy chain attached to three enormous anchors spread out triangularly. The transports were safer during their short stay in the harbor, after these buoys were placed, as it has an unfortunate reputation during the hurricane season among seafaring men. For lack of mooring buoys, one United States ship, the Yosemite, had been lost there and the cable ship Scotia totally wrecked at the mouth of the harbor for want of proper entrance buoys—both since the American occupation.

Many other improvements of less importance were commenced and have since been completed, but the greater of all measures were those for the amelioration and conservation of the public health and the establishment, on a permanent basis, of the public schools.

SANITATION.

Most of the people live in Agana, where about 8,000 are congregated. This is located on a nearly flat shelf near the ocean, having a height of about 7 feet above high-water level. The Agana River, a small stream, flows through the town with sufficient current to be saved from pollution, and this is used by the natives indiscriminately for every conceivable purpose except drinking. Its ultimate effect is undoubtedly beneficial, for all the town washing is done there and it affords a public bath much frequented. The drinking water is drawn from surface wells, 7 or 8 feet deep at most, which are numerous all over the town site, and which have been infested for generations with the germs of the lumbricoid worm. It is surprising that the Chamorros have survived this pest, for it is present in their bodies all through their lives, probably without exception, in such quantities as to stagger belief. The Americans do not escape it entirely. By using the distilled water at their service and keeping careful watch on the preparation of their food, they are usually immune. This has been both an indirect and a direct menace to the efficiency of the naval station. The attention of the American governors, therefore, was early devoted to the introduction of pure water. A careful examination of the sources available was made by an expert, who selected a hill stream near the town of Agana, and, after an instrumental survey, made an estimate in detail for an impounding dam reservoir, distributing pipes, and hydrants for an efficient service, costing $50,000. After several years of earnest effort on the part of successive governors, the appropriation was finally secured from Congress, and the present governor, Capt. E. J. Dorn, United States Navy, wrote me by the last mail that he had had the supreme satisfaction of turning on the water from the completed system, thus inaugurating the physical regeneration of a small nation.

With the disappearance of the lumbricoid worm and the construction of an already planned tuberculosis camp in the hills, other diseases from which the natives suffer will either disappear or be sensibly modified.

The lepers were early segregated and have been carefully watched and studied, everything being done to ameliorate their pitiful lot. And within the last few years the same course has been pursued with the victims of gangosa, a terrible disease which seems peculiar to Guam. In this the upper part of the face is destroyed by slow ulceration. The naval medical officers have made great progress in the successful treatment of this. They have demonstrated practically that it is a condition resulting from inherited disease introduced originally by the western foreigner. Recent advices from the island are that segregation for gangosa has been discontinued. And here I would like to say that to the untiring efforts of the naval surgeons, their unselfish devotion, and their high professional skill both natives and governors owe a debt of gratitude indeed.

The lack of pure water, the principal factor in a campaign for sanitation, did not deter us from making efforts in other directions possible of attainment. The entire population was vaccinated and measures taken to insure a constant supply of fresh virus and an effective rounding up and treatment of nonvaccinated individuals. This had never been done. The hospital for enlisted men, which included a ward for native men, inaugurated by a former governor, was enlarged, put in thorough repair, and a well-equipped operating room added. Through the efforts of my wife a hospital was established for women and children. For the first time in the history of the island, after about 300 years of Christian occupation, there was provided a suitable place for their medical treatment outside of their crowded and unsanitary homes. This was urgently needed. At the universal request of the natives it was called the Susana Hospital, Susana being the Spanish equivalent for Mrs. Dyer's Christian name.

The women are shy and reserved. It is difficult to get them to speak of their ailments and almost impossible to make them follow medical advice. It was obvious that in any far-reaching scheme for health improvement their interest and cooperation must be secured. The only way to do this was to establish a hospital for their sole use where they could be sent, forcibly if necessary, and where a class of native nurses could be trained. These could go among their sisters, secure their confidence, teach them the importance of cleanliness as it affected their health and that of their families, and finally work a change in their attitude toward medical attention. This would have been impossible of accomplishment but for Mrs. Norman McLean, wife of Surg. McLean, of the Navy, herself a trained nurse, who undertook the task of instructing a class of native girls. A Women's Hospital Aid Association was formed, composed entirely of native women, whose duty it was to seek out subjects for medical aid, to induce them to apply voluntarily at the hospital for treatment, and to see that their children and homes were cared for during their absence; also to report cases urgently requiring attention when they refused to present themselves or to notify the proper authority of their condition. The hospital fees were fixed at a low figure and an attempt made to graduate them according to the means of the patient, which it was the office of the Woman's Aid Association to determine. There are but few people in the island abjectly poor.

As an adjunct to the hospital a dispensary and pharmacy has since been equipped, where wounds and sores are dressed and medicines sold. This was well attended from the outset and has been a useful factor in overcoming the native woman's prejudices, as up to this time there had been only men attendants available. The pharmacy has also contributed to the maintenance of the hospital. I am happy to say that this establishing a woman's hospital has entirely justified the hopes of its founder. It has accomplished more than was anticipated. Since her return to the United States Mrs. Dyer has succeeded in inducing Mrs. Russell Sage to endow this hospital with a handsome sum, which, with other funds collected by Mrs. Dyer, is administered by the Sage Foundation.

THE SCHOOLS.

Previous to 1904 it had not been feasible to inaugurate any system of schools. It did not seem possible to continue in that course, and an effort was begun at once to get them on a permanent basis.

To supply a corps of teachers every woman in the American colony not having absorbing duties at home, was drafted into service, including my two daughters and a young lady guest. With alacrity and admirable devotion they responded and helped largely to make the effort successful. Several soldiers from the Marine detachment and a number of native men and women who had already acquired a fairly good knowledge of English made up the necessary complement. From a pedogogical standpoint but few of the teachers were well equipped. The double negative was very prominent in their instruction, but they made up in intelligence, earnestness, and industry for lapses of grammar, which were, after all, immaterial. What was needed by the natives was the power to express themselves in and to understand English, enabling them to form a bond of comprehension between themselves and the Americans. It has always seemed to me that most of the trouble in the world began with the building of the Tower of Babel.

The governor then issued a decree making attendance at school compulsory for all boys between the ages of 7 and 13 and all girls between the ages of 7 and 12. A small fine was imposed on parents or guardians for the absence of pupils without reasonable excuse. The use of the cable brought us quickly a supply of necessary textbooks The active interest of the children and their relatives, with that of the teachers, helped in the starting of what seemed at first a rather impracticable undertaking.

My naval associates have often smiled at my selection of a Navy boatswain for superintendent of public instruction, but for that place there could have been no better, and I have never ceased to be grateful that the services of Chief Boatswain Brooks happened to be available at that particular juncture. In a very short time the schools were running efficiently in all parts of the island, and the 2,000 children of school age were attending with a regularity that could scarcely be secured elsewhere. Personal cleanliness and order were insisted on from the beginning, lavatories for each sex were built near each schoolhouse, in which during school hours were stationed a man and a woman. Every child on entering the schoolhouse was inspected by a teacher and, if not clean in person, was sent to the lavatory and thoroughly scrubbed. If the clothes were soiled or rent the children were sent home for attention. Immediately after roll call and inspection each day the children needing medical advice were sent to the hospital and the truant officer started after the absentees. Within a short time those responsible for the delinquents were before the justice of the peace and subjected to a fine if their excuses were insufficient. This was most effective. Few absences occurred after the people learned what to expect, and the scholars came to school scrupulously neat. Best of all the native community appreciated and supported the measures taken for the children's welfare.

From this beginning developed the normal school, to which were sent the advanced and intelligent compulsory scholars and the volunteers beyond the school age. This school has since fulfilled to some extent its purpose of supplying native English-speaking teachers.

An agricultural class of 29 boys was started under an experienced instructor—a very intelligent and highly educated German who drifted into Guam most opportunely, and who has since assisted materially in the development of the island. In the absence of a regularly equipped manual-training school, which we had no money to establish, lads were placed as apprentices in the hospital, the printing office, the blacksmith's, the plumber's, and the carpenter's shops, the machine shop and the ice plant. Night schools for the older people were well attended.

Perhaps the most satisfactory progress of all was in the branch of music. Singing was taught in the public schools and a party of boys, numbering 28 at first and afterwards increased, was selected as a class in instrumental music, one of the most competent musicians in the naval station band being detailed as instructor. The formation of this band constituted an epoch in the history of Guam. The religious ceremonies which are the principal factors for happiness as well as excitement in the lives of this isolated folk are now completed by music furnished by their own people. Previously they had none for these occasions. Those of them who had visited the Philippine Islands and noted the prominence of bands during the religious fiestas lamented the absence in Guam of this significant feature. It may be said, without exaggeration, that the establishment of the Chamorro Band has been to the natives one of the most gratifying results of the American occupation. The conception of this band had a greater significance than appears on the surface. The natives have astonishingly few amusements. General instruction of the population in instrumental music will add a wholesome and profound pleasure to their lives. The apprentice bandsmen were destined to go among their fellows in the outlying towns all through the island and promote the cause of instrumental music.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION.

With limited resources and a keen sense of its importance we started an experimental farm to give the natives a practical example in the use of labor-saving tools and modern methods of cultivation and to stimulate them to increase the variety of their food products. Satisfactory and profitable relations were established with the various bureaus of the United States Department of Agriculture, with the department of agriculture in the Philippine Islands, and with the various agencies, public and private, devoted to this purpose in all parts of the world. The influence of this station began to be felt at once. It was an attractive growth to foster. Feeling, however, that as the great resources of the Department of Agriculture of the United States had been freely extended to other dependent peoples in the establishment of experimental stations, we could hope for a similar attention to Guam, steps were taken to induce the Secretary of that great department to include Guam station in his estimates. After many vicissitudes this was done in 1908, and finally the island station was amalgamated with a well equipped and efficient Federal station. In a recent number of the Guam News Letter, published monthly, it was interesting to note the advertisement for sale by a local trader of fresh vegetable seeds of all kinds.

I believe it is just to say that the interests of the people of Guam, as well as those of the United States, have always been well served by the American governors, and that the march of improvement has been uninterrupted. Much, however, still remains to be done, and an intelligent interest on the part of the public at home will aid materially the efforts of the men on the spot, who suffer under the handicap of distance and indifference to their needs.

[Fifth session, Friday morning, Oct. 21, 1910.]

The CHAIRMAN. Our subject for discussion this morning is Porto Rico, and it gives me great pleasure to present as the first speaker, Hon. HERBERT PARSONS, Member of Congress from New York.

THE OLMSTED BILL AND ITS PROVISIONS.

(Address of Hon. HERBERT PARSONS.)

The Committee on Insular Affairs, of which for several years I have been a member, reported to, and pressed to passage through, the House of Representatives, the Olmsted bill reforming the act providing a civil government for Porto Rico, in order to put into the fundamental law of Porto Rico the following new provisions:

1. A provision making the citizens of Porto Rico collectively citizens of the United States.

2. A provision by which hereafter voters in addition to those heretofore registered must either be able to read and write or own taxable real estate personally or as a member of a firm.

3. A senate of 13 members, to be chosen quadrennially, of which 5 shall be elected at the first election, 6 at the second, 7 at the third, and an additional one at each succeeding election, the balance to be appointed by the President, and this senate to take the place of the executive council, which now consists of 6 Americans and 5 Porto Ricans.

4. A house of delegates to consist of 1 member from each of 33 districts instead of 5 members from each of 7 districts.

5. A centralized health department, with a commissioner at the head, appointed by the President.

6. Minimum appropriations of $130,000 for each of the next five years, out of insular revenues, and 15 per cent out of municipal incomes, for sanitary work.

7. A civil-service director, to be appointed by the President, and a prohibition of the passage of any law which would prevent the free transfer of persons in the classified service between Porto Rico and the United States in the case of a position requiring expert scientific knowledge, or any citizen of the United States or of Porto Rico from taking civil-service examinations for such position and securing appointment without preference as to residence.

8. The establishment of a public-service commission which would have charge of the granting of franchises and should consist of the attorney general, the treasurer, the auditor, the commissioner of the interior, and two Porto Ricans to be elected by the people; this commission to have the power over franchises hitherto exercised by the executive council and also its power in regard to municipal loans and funds and advancements of insular funds to municipalities and school boards.

9. A provision excluding any corporation from the business of buying and selling real estate or holding or owning real estate not reasonably necessary to enable it to carry out its purposes and effectively prohibiting a corporation engaged in agriculture from owning or leasing more than 3,000 acres—a provision which takes the place of the present ineffective limitation of 500 acres.

10. A provision enabling the Porto Rican legislature to create a department of agriculture, commerce, and labor, if it shall see fit to do so.

11. A change somewhat limiting the jurisdiction of the United States district court for Porto Rico and providing that the salaries of the judge and officials and the court expenses shall be paid by the United States.

12. A provision that the municipal judges of Porto Rico shall hereafter be appointed by the governor instead of elected.

13. The governor is given absolute power of veto of any law passed by the Porto Rican Legislature. No franchise is legal until approved by the President after passage by the senate of Porto Rico, and Congress still reserves the right to annul any franchise or any law.

The bill passed the House of Representatives, but has not yet been acted upon by the Senate.

Why did the Committee on Insular Affairs recommend these changes in the fundamental law of Porto Rico?

1. As to citizenship, Porto Ricans were in an anomalous position. Some claimed that under the Foraker Act they were citizens of the United States, others that they were not. If the latter were so, then they were citizens of Porto Rico, but men and women without a country. There was just as much reason why they should be American citizens as there was why the Mexicans of New Mexico should be. There was more reason why they should be citizens of the United States after having been for 12 years under its laws and commercially and economically a part of it than why the immigrant from abroad, here for a less time, should be admitted to citizenship. And even though citizenship be a matter of sentiment—and it is more than that—glad should we be to bind them to us by the strong tie of such a sentiment.

2. With the granting of greater popular rights in the way of electing their representatives it seemed wise to restrict the suffrage, so great is the percentage of illiteracy among Porto Ricans. When we took possession the illiteracy was 77.3 per cent and the school attendance only 8 per cent. Despite as great an increase in school supply as resources will permit, the school attendance is now only about 30 per cent, and it will be many years yet before Porto Rico will have reached the condition of a substantially educated people with a correcting public opinion, the prerequisite in my mind to complete control of its own affairs. To this limitation of the suffrage there was little objection. Those who now have the right to vote will continue to have it, but in the future new voters must either be able to read and write or own property.

There is a considerable farming class that is illiterate, and I have been told that such people of the hills vote far more independently than do many of those in the cities who are able to read and write. These farmers will still form part of the voting population, and so will their successors; but the future laborers in the sugar centrales, said to be easily subject to political corralling by their employers, will not in the future become voters unless they can read and write.

3. Heretofore the upper body of the legislature was the executive council, the majority of which was constituted of appointive executive officials. So far as we have been able to ascertain, that scheme worked greatly to the welfare of Porto Rico. The Porto Ricans were opposed to it for sentimental reasons, claiming that the union of the executive with the legislative was un-American.

I think that a mistake was made in separating the two, and I believe that the growth of the commission idea of city government, in which the executive officials compose also the city legislature, indicates the well working of such a union of functions as does the great influence of the executive over the legislative indicate the inevitable identification in the minds of the people of the chief executive official mainly by his legislative program. The senate is made gradually wholly elective, so that by the year 1924 a majority of the Senate shall be elective. This change was a compromise with the wishes of the Porto Rican politicians, who demanded a wholly elective senate immediately.

4. The principal change in regard to the house of delegates was to provide that each member should be elected from a district instead of five from each of seven districts. The house is now wholly composed of members of the Unionist party. The other party, the Republican party, has considerable strength in some localities, and it is believed that this change will give a better opportunity for minority representation. Now 15 of the 35 members live in the city of San Juan. They are Unionists, though that city is Republican. In the future each representative will have to be a resident of his district, a requisite with which I myself do not sympathize. The same requirement was inserted in regard to senators.

5. The principal feature of the bill is the provision for a centralized health department. The provisions are drastic, but they were considered essential in order to make Porto Rico the extremely healthful place that it should be and to insure the continuance of the splendid work introduced by Dr. Bailey K. Ashforth, of the United States Army, in the suppression of anemia, more popularly known as the hookworm disease. The death rate in Porto Rico was 40.86 per thousand in 1901. In 1909 it was a trifle below 21, but in Cuba we have reduced it to 14. We intend to put it as low as that in Porto Rico; we can not do it under the present system, where there is a constant conflict, according to Gov. Post, between insular and local authorities. In his last report Gov. Post said:

"Large districts of the island are absolutely without medical attention, and men, women, and children suffer and die in utter neglect. There are several towns where there is no resident doctor, and the town is too poor to pay a salary which might induce one to come. Should a serious epidemic break out in the island the result would be decimation. Every attempt to get the legislature to take serious action in this matter has failed, usually owing to jealousy existing between the local and central authorities."

One year the lower house of the legislature failed to make any appropriation for the work to suppress anemia, although its suppression is so vital to the island that Mr. W. J. Bryan appeared before our committee and urged congressional appropriation for the eradication of the disease. For three months the work stopped, and the appropriation then made at a special session was not up to the average of the preceding year and the control was taken from the governor, although the work had been initiated under gubernatorial auspices and urgency, and was placed where, in the course of time, it might be used for political jobbery.

6. It was accordingly essential not only to centralize the work and put the physicians and employees throughout the island on a civil-service basis, as the Olmsted bill does, but also to make mandatory minimum appropriations both out of the insular revenues and the municipal revenues.

7. Antipathy to the merit system and to the use of outsiders, no matter how expert, was showing itself in Porto Rico, as it has shown itself elsewhere, and for that reason it was necessary that Congress should legislate so that Porto Rico can secure the most expert service and so that the director of the service should be dependent upon the President, whose only desire would be efficiency, rather than upon local influences, where the pressure for jobs might be strong.

8. No more up-to-date work has been done in Porto Rico than the system of granting franchises, which has been managed by the executive council. The power of granting franchises has proved so corrupting to popularly elected bodies that it seemed wise to give to Porto Rico such a public-service commission as we have here. There it was possible to constitute it largely of executive officials familiar with the details the consideration of which would be necessary. Porto Rican representation on the commission was most desirable, and therefore the plan was copied that prevails in some of our States of making those members elective.

9. A large farm-owning population is a fine element in any Commonwealth. Great as may be the economic advantages of large corporate ownership of land, still greater are the advantages in the way of a sound citizenship of a large farm-owning population. How much the development of the tobacco and sugar industries in Porto Rico has changed the former condition of affairs we do not know and will not know until the present census is completed and published, but the present law, which nominally limited corporation ownership to 500 acres, but imposed no penalty and so was ineffective, has probably permitted the passing of a considerable acreage into corporation control. That we wish to stop for the future, so that Porto Rico can continue to have a considerable farm-owning population. According to her census in 1899, there were 39,021 farms of an average size of 45 acres, the percentage of owners was 93 per cent, and the percentage of the cultivated area owned by the occupants was 91 per cent, as against 43.5 per cent in Cuba.

10. It may be possible to greatly increase the fertility of Porto Rico, and to that end a department of agriculture might contribute. We accordingly make it possible for the Porto Rico Legislature to establish a department of agriculture and labor, but we do not make such a department mandatory, owing to the expense that it would entail.

11. The committee was addressed by very able Porto Rican lawyers, who much desired a limitation of the jurisdiction of the United States district court. On the other hand, some American lawyers and corporations not only protested against any limitation of the jurisdiction, but even desired an increase of it. The change that was made consisted in an increase in the amount necessary to furnish jurisdiction from $1,000 to $2,000 and in treating citizens of the United States domiciled in Porto Rico as citizens of Porto Rico for jurisdictional purposes and not as citizens of the United States with a domicile in the United States.

In addition the controversy that existed over the payment of salaries of and expenses incurred by the Federal court officials was eliminated by providing that they shall be paid by the United States, as is usually the case.

12. Porto Rico has had an excellent judiciary in her higher courts. The judges of the higher courts have been appointed, but the municipal judges have been elected. There has been considerable complaint of favoritism by municipal judges and a number of them were removed by the governor, some of them later being reelected despite the removal. Jury trials are almost unknown and the power of the judges is therefore greater even than here. We thought it better to make the lower judges appointive as well as the higher judges, and so the change provided that the governor shall appoint them.

13. An absolute veto by the governor over any legislation passed by the legislature met with favor and no opposition from Porto Rican representatives, and the bill contains it. There is some fear, however, that to curry popular favor the legislature may pass improper legislation, leaving it to the governor to veto it. Such a result would be only embarrassing to the governor and tend to make still more acute any feeling that exists against Americans.

Some of these changes were favored by the Porto Ricans, some were not. They were all dictated, however, by a desire to give Porto Rico an efficient government, which, at the same time, should be as popular as possible. Efficiency has been regarded as the first essential. Mr. Dickinson, the Secretary of War, visited Porto Rico, and many of the changes were made upon his recommendation. The committee held lengthy hearings, at which were present Mr. Muñoz Rivera, the leader of the Unionist Party in Porto Rico, the party that controls unanimously the house of delegates, and other representatives of that body, as well as representatives of the other party. The bill was debated in the house of representatives for several calendar Wednesdays, and then passed.

Porto Rico has been greatly blessed since American occupation. Its imports have increased from $9,366,230 in 1901 to $26,544,326 in 1909, and its exports from about $8,000,000 in 1901 to about $30,000,000 in 1909. It enjoys a singular position in regard to taxation. Many of the taxes which with us go to the expenses of the Federal Government, in Porto Rico are allowed to go to increase the insular revenues and to be used for things which with us are city and State purposes.

But not by dollars and cents should we measure the worth of our work in Porto Rico. Indeed, the true measure can not come until Porto Rico shall have an efficient government, republican in form and popular in reality, and take her place in the sisterhood of States. For that distant day we are preparing her, so that when her people come into full control they will appreciate that the power of the ballot is the power to secure the best of sanitation, the most just of courts and judges, and disinterested, intelligent, and courageous representatives. We can instill into them that future demand for the two things first mentioned by giving such to them now, trusting to the laws of imitation to give them the proper desire for them when they come into their full liberties. Another duty we now have to perform and are seeking to perform, is to protect a people, so largely illiterate, from spoliation and other evils that ignorance and lack of foresight might visit upon them. When the time approaches for granting complete self-government, I would rather see a popular government, even if somewhat less efficient, than the most efficient government without training in self-control and self-dependence. Among colonial powers, if we are to be called such, we have led the way in training for self-government the people who are dependent upon us. Peculiar interest, therefore, must we have in Porto Rico, for she is likely to be our first finished product.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, during my term of service in Congress I want to testify to the high character and ability of the men who have been commissioners of this District, and I think it is generally conceded that at no time have we had three more able men than the gentlemen who are occupying those positions in the District at this time. The suggestion has been made here by some that there is no use of increasing the salary, because you can always find somebody who will take the place at whatever the salary is. I remember hearing that statement made more than 25 years ago in the State of Michigan with reference to the pay of the circuit judges and of our governor. At that time and until recently we were paying our governor only $1,000. Then we were paying our circuit judges the small salary of $1,500 a year. To-day every circuit judge in the State of Michigan is paid all the way from $3,500 to $6,000, and as a result we get men of ability.

A further question has been raised that this matter ought to have come before the District Committee—I submit that it had—but I think in a few remarks I made a little while ago I gave sufficient reasons to the House why this, as well as other matters, had not been brought before the District Committee during this Congress, and that was simply and solely because it had become evident that the House did not feel inclined to give the District Committee time in which to transact its business. I want to say further that, so far as I am concerned as a member of that committee, had this legislation been brought before us I for one would have supported it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL].

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, at 12 o'clock noon next Saturday this Congress will go out of existence, and its record for good or bad will go into history. I for one regret to see during these closing days the raid that is being made on the Treasury of the United States. We act as though we think this is going to be our last chance for some time to legislate, and we seem determined to raise the high salaries of the Nation's officials. If we were raising the salaries all along the line—the low salaries as well as the high—of the men and women lower down in the service and who are drawing small salaries and who are working as faithfully and efficiently in their limited service, as we are disposed to raise the high salaries, I would not feel so much inclined to oppose this amendment. I do not know that it is the intention of any man here, but it looks as though the officials whose salaries are to be raised and the Members of Congress who are inclined to raise those salaries, are bent on getting them raised now before we get out of power, on the theory apparently that they will not be raised by the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber when they come into power. I don't know but that is a compliment to the other side of this House, and I for one do not believe it is good politics for us to do it. To my mind there is no good reason, either as a business proposition or on political grounds, that we should raise the salaries of these commissioners.

Only a few months ago there were two vacancies on this commission, and there were a dozen or more candidates, so far as I know all able, competent, and honorable men, who wanted to get these positions. Two of those men were appointed and the others were disappointed. Those two men are hardly warm in their seats before it is proposed to raise their salaries. It is so all along the line, not only in the Federal service but in the State and municipal lines of the service. People pull every wire and invoke every possible influence to get positions. They actually crawl on their bellies for the jobs, and as soon as they get them it immediately occurs to them that the salaries are not big enough and they want more.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask the gentleman if he considers the gentlemen referred to were applicants, or, that they wanted the jobs, because I want to inform him that they were not.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I do not know about that, but I have no doubt they felt highly honored in getting those positions; and if they were not applicants for those positions, and if they did not want them, and if now they do not want their salaries raised, as I am informed is the case, I do not see any good reason why the Congress should at this time undertake to raise them. These commissioners are high-class men and are doing very excellent work in the government of this city, and they are entitled to all honor and respect on the part of the people of this city and of the country, and they are further entitled to our highest consideration because they are not demanding an increase of salary.

They have proper appreciation of this dignified and honorable position. They could probably make much more in their private business, but they are willing to spend freely of their time and energy for the public good and for the great honor which is due them, and I am one of those who are willing to take off our hats to them. These men are not disposed to reduce these dignified, honorable, responsible, and powerful positions to the dollar standard. They are willing to accept the salary as it is and take the balance of their compensation out in honor, dignity, and social influence which go with these positions; and this is a high and wholesome ambition. Five thousand dollars is not a small or niggardly salary for these gentlemen, and will support them in a fair degree of comfort and abundance, even if they have no private fortune or income other than their salaries. It would not support them in luxury or in extravagance or in a high social way, but I submit that in this as well as in other positions in the Federal service, and in the public service generally, men should not expect or try to exact salaries so large that they may live in luxury and extravagance on them. The same rule should apply to these men which applies to judges, Senators, Representatives, and other high-grade servants of the Government.

On the question of the amount of salary and its supporting capacity these commissioners should not be compared with mayors throughout the country. The office of mayor of a city the size of Washington—and smaller as well as larger—is sought after by distinguished citizens not simply for the salary, but for the honor and dignity which go with the places. But a man who is elected mayor in any city is, of necessity, required to spend a larger or smaller amount in his campaign; and if successful, he is required to spend money all the year around in contributing toward all sorts of charities and public and private enterprises in the city. Then there are people calling on him all the time for contributions which he can not well escape. This is not strictly true in Washington, because the commissioners are not elected and are not responsible to the rank and file of the people, and are not under obligations to them, and therefore are not called upon to respond in small contributions to their political supporters when in need. In this as in other dignified and honorable positions in the public service of the country the salary is reasonable, and the position is and should be sought for the honor, dignity, and the good that can be done in it; and for this reason I trust that the motion to increase these salaries will not prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FORNES].

Mr. FORNES. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, in the first place I desire to express my appreciation for the compliment accorded me during the discussion of the subject, a few days ago, of establishing an asphalt plant. My colleague was kind enough to express the opinion that owing to my experience in municipal affairs I might be able to say something valuable upon that point. From that point of view my remarks regarding an increase of salary may be of some weight, in order to get a comparison of the salaries paid in the administration of the city of New York. My esteemed colleague from New York, to whom I have frequently listened with the greatest admiration and profit, in his statement is somewhat in error considering the cost of the administration of the city of New York. However different that may be, it can not have a direct bearing as to the increase of these salaries. There is a good theory to observe that when the office seeks the man the office generally gets the right man, but when the man seeks the office, then it is a question of debate as to the merits of the man. Whenever that is the question it seems to me that at a salary of $5,000 the office is seeking the man, and, owing to the conditions and the administration of the affairs of this beautiful city, I believe that the man sought for is fully qualified as to the fulfillment of that work. A mistake has been made in the assertion that the administrative responsibilities of the executives of the city of New York are not as great as are those of these commissioners. It should be made known that whoever has charge of the administration of a borough of New York has the appointment of a public highway commissioner, who is paid $6,000 a year, but who is not held as responsible for the excution of the work of the office as is the commissioner in the city of Washington. We should bear in mind this one proposition—that he who has the final decision in the matter is he who is held responsible for the execution of the work pertaining to the office, whether you have deputies or whether you have assistants or a commissioner, or like the senior member of the firm, who is held responsible for the success of the enterprise and the execution of the work.

When we consider that these three commissioners are responsible for the annual expenditure of $12,000,000, and at an official salary of $5,000—is that a fair recompense for the responsibility assumed? Would not a commercial house which is transacting a yearly business of $12,000,000 deem a salary of $5,000 a year insufficient for the responsibility assumed and the results accomplished? Is it not a fact, then, that where you are imposing a duty upon an executive in regard to work, that the recompense should be at least in comparison with the responsibilities? Here it is stated that the salary of a commissioner for the last 30 years has been $5,000 a year. What has been accomplished by these commissioners? What is being accomplished every day? The beauty of this city is the only argument necessary to answer the question. The great things that have been accomplished——

Mr. GOULDEN. And these commissioners are not only alone responsible to the people of the District, but they are responsible, through the Representatives in Congress, to the whole country.

Mr. FORNES. Yes; and it is for that reason we ought to recognize that responsibility and pay for it fairly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit me, I desire to say that he comes from a great city, and I come from another great city. Does not the gentleman think the city of Washington is one of the best governed cities in this country?

Mr. FORNES. Yes, sir; and I will say this, that the city of Washington is virtually the great national city, a central attraction of the entire world, and I do not care where they come from, and we ought to show our sense of appreciation by encouraging these commissioners and giving them at least a fair recompense for the time that they have devoted to keep this city in the condition it is, and who have built it up to its present degree of beauty and measure of perfection.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT].

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I can not see how there can be any question that it would be a proper thing to raise these salaries. I think the great mistake is that a suggestion has been made to raise them to $6,000 a year. I think they ought to have $7,500. The suggestion that my colleague from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL] made, that they had been crawling to get their salaries increased, is ridiculous. The board of trade has asked to have these salaries increased. They are entirely inadequate at $5,000. The civilian commissioners are both men of means, and that is the only reason why they can hold this position. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL] made the suggestion as to there always being plenty of people to fill positions, and that we are raising the high-salaried men and not the low-salaried men. I believe in raising the low salaries, but I never yet have heard that there were any governmental positions where there were not more applicants than there were offices to fill.

Mr. GOULDEN. The gentleman, I understand, is a leading member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and therefore, is familiar with this subject?

Mr. OLCOTT. I am a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and have been for the last six years, and I know these commissioners are hard-worked men, and that they work faithfully and honestly.

Mr. BENNET of New York. There is a bill before the District Committee to increase the salaries. Why does not the committee report that bill out?

Mr. OLCOTT. Whoever introduced the bill certainly did not press it, or it would have been considered by that committee. Besides that, the Committee on the District has some twenty-eight general bills on the calendar, and we have failed to get an opportunity to have them considered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman recall the commissioners having appeared before that committee to press such a bill?

Mr. OLCOTT. The District Commissioners have never appeared before the District of Columbia Committee and have never asked any increase of salary or the passage of that bill.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in concluding this discussion, I want to say that it has been represented over and over again on the floor of the House to-day that the two civilian commissioners were applicants for office. I desire to disclaim that representation. They were sought for and did not seek the place. As to the engineer commissioner, the third member, he is assigned here by the President of the United States just as any other Regular Army officer is detailed and assigned to special duty elsewhere than in the line. Again, gentlemen, it is asserted that we have raised the salaries of the high-class men and not those of the low. Anyone who will go through this bill will see that a large percentage of all the agreements are upon the raising of men who were getting from $600 a year to $1,000 a year. Above that amount is the exception. We have endeavored to raise the low men to where they could possibly live on the salary which the Government pays them—a large number from $600 to $720, which is the next lift. And we believe we are entirely within bounds when we ask that the commissioners shall receive $6,000 a year, and yet we only ask what they can live decently on in the city in the place which they have been called to fill.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question for information?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Is not one of the civilian commissioners a retired officer of the Army?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Without pay. He resigned from the Army. He gets no pay whatever, although ranking as a brigadier general in the Army.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has shown that work is divided. He himself stands at the head of a great institution. He never would have been there for a year or a month if he had not the ability to select his subordinates. That is true of our public school system. We pay our superintendent more than any other man in the system because we assume he has the ability to select good subordinates. That is what puts the general at the head of the army. We pay our generals large salaries because they have or ought to have the genius to select men under them that can perform the business of war. That is true in all great enterprises, corporate and otherwise. Mr. Speaker, I hope this motion will prevail. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recede from the disagreement and agree to the Senate amendments numbered 1, 2, and 3.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 76.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CARY. Yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 147, answered "present" 8, not voting 114, as follows:

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I understand that there is no further point of disagreement, and now that this is settled, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to amendments 1, 2, and 3 and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill making appropriations for the Army.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 31237) making appropriations for the support of the Army.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there are just three amendments, and all rewritten. I ask that the conference report be read in lieu of the statement, so that it will show exactly what they are.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 31237) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter appearing in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Hereafter the pay and allowances of Army paymasters' clerks shall be the same as provided by law for Navy paymasters' clerks on shore duty, and they shall also be entitled to the same right of retirement with the same retired pay as is now allowed Navy paymasters' clerks: Provided, That Army paymasters' clerks shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the Senate agree to its amendment numbered 23 as amended by the House, with amendments as follows:

On page 1 of said amendment as amended, in line 7, strike out the words "State, Territory, and the District of Columbia"; and in line 8 strike out the words "not to exceed one additional officer for each," and strike out the comma which appears at the end of line 8.

On page 2 of said amendment as amended, in line 18, strike out the words "one-fifth" and insert in lieu thereof "one-half," so that the amendment will read: "Upon the request of the governors of the several States and Territories concerned, the President may detach officers of the active list of the Army from their proper commands for duty as inspectors and instructors of the Organized Militia, as follows, namely: Not to exceed one officer for each regiment and separate battalion of infantry, or its equivalent of other troops: Provided, That line officers detached for duty with the Organized Militia under the provisions hereof, together with those detached from their proper commands, under the provisions of law, for other duty the usual period of which exceeds one year, shall be subject to the provisions of section twenty-seven of the act approved February second, nineteen hundred and one, with reference to details to the staff corps, but the total number of detached officers hereby made subject to these provisions shall not exceed two hundred: And provided further, That the number of such officers detached from each of the several branches of the line of the Army shall be in proportion to the authorized commissioned strength of that branch; they shall be of the grades first lieutenant to colonel, inclusive, and the number detached from each grade shall be in proportion to the number in that grade now provided by law for the whole Army. The vacancies hereby caused or created in the grade of second lieutenant shall be filled in accordance with existing law, one-half in each fiscal year until the total number of vacancies shall have been filled: Provided, That hereafter vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant occurring in any fiscal year shall be filled by appointment in the following order, namely: First, of cadets graduated from the United States Military Academy during that fiscal year; second, of enlisted men whose fitness for promotion shall have been determined by competitive examination; third, of candidates from civil life between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-seven years. The President is authorized to make rules and regulations to carry these provisions into effect: Provided, That the Quartermaster's Department is hereby increased by two colonels, three lieutenant colonels, seven majors, and eighteen captains, the vacancies thus created to be filled by promotion and detail in accordance with section 26 of the act approved February 2, 1901"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 49: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 49, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter appearing in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Hereafter there shall be attached to the Medical Department a dental corps, which shall be composed of dental surgeons and acting dental surgeons, the total number of which shall not exceed the proportion of one to each thousand of actual enlisted strength of the Army; the number of dental surgeons shall not exceed 60, and the number of acting dental surgeons shall be such as may, from time to time, be authorized by law. All original appointments to the dental corps shall be as acting dental surgeons, who shall have the same official status, pay, and allowances as the contract dental surgeons now authorized by law. Acting dental surgeons who have served three years in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War shall be eligible for appointment as dental surgeons, and, after passing in a satisfactory manner an examination which may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, may be commissioned with the rank of first lieutenant in the dental corps to fill the vacancies existing therein. Officers of the dental corps shall have rank in such corps according to date of their commissions therein and shall rank next below officers of the Medical Reserve Corps. Their right to command shall be limited to the dental corps. The pay and allowances of dental surgeons shall be those of first lieutenants, including the right to retirement on account of age or disability, as in the case of other officers: Provided, That the time served by dental surgeons as acting dental or contract dental surgeons shall be reckoned in computing the increased service pay of such as are commissioned under this act. The appointees as acting dental surgeons must be citizens of the United States between 21 and 27 years of age, graduates of a standard dental college, of good moral character and good professional education, and they shall be required to pass the usual physical examination required for appointment in the Medical Corps, and a professional examination which shall include tests of skill, in practical dentistry and of proficiency in the usual subjects of a standard dental college course: Provided, That the contract dental surgeons attached to the Medical Department at the time of the passage of this act may be eligible for appointment as first lieutenants, dental corps, without limitation as to age: And provided further, That the professional examination for such appointment may be waived in the case of contract dental surgeons in the service at the time of the passage of this act whose efficiency reports and entrance examinations are satisfactory. The Secretary of War is authorized to appoint boards of three examiners to conduct the examinations herein prescribed, one of whom shall be a surgeon in the Army and two of whom shall be selected by the Secretary of War from the commissioned dental surgeons"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

Amendment No. 18, in disagreement between the Houses, refers to the status of paymasters' clerks, and the House recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the same with an amendment placing the Army paymasters' clerks on exactly the same footing as the Navy paymasters' clerks.

Amendment No. 23, in disagreement, refers to increase of officers for the Army for detail with the militia, and other purposes, and the House recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the same by striking out all details for each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia, division, brigade, and permits the detail for the organizing of the militia only, and provides for filling the vacancies one-half each fiscal year, and agrees to the amendment made by the House in regard to the Quartermaster's Department.

Amendment No. 49 relates to the Dental Corps, and the House recedes from its disagreement and authorizes the grade of first lieutenant only for the Dental Corps.

J. A. T. HULL,
GEO. W. PRINCE,
W. SULZER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I assume that the House understands the report, as it has been pretty fully debated heretofore. The first amendment that is in dispute relates to the Pay Corps, the paymaster's clerks.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What amendment is that?

Mr. MANN. The paymaster's clerks is No. 18.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The proposal that has been agreed upon varies from that which was provided for in the original bill by the Senate in this, that the paymaster's clerks enter the service at $1,125 a year. Under the present law they enter at $1,400 a year. This provision will increase their pay each 3 years until after 12 years of service they will reach $2,000, which is practically the same as was provided in the Army bill in the original Senate amendment. The Pay Department suggested the insertion of an additional proviso providing that no paymaster's clerk should have his pay reduced as a result of this legislation; but the committee believe if we were going to put the two services on an exact equality the clerks should suffer the loss while they are young and get the benefit as they get older and after years of satisfactory service. So we declined to make any restriction of that kind and put it flatly on the same service as the Navy. I think every member of the committee will acknowledge that a paymaster's clerk of the Army, compelled to travel in the Tropics or Alaska or wherever it is necessary in the discharge of his duty, is entitled to as much pay as the same class of the service in the Navy. This should be a final settlement of the question.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. O'CONNELL. As I understand, you did that to equalize the Navy. In the report of the Naval Committee have they not recommended to have the dentists get three ranks?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have not yet reached that, but I will say here that is not the law.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Paymaster's clerks, as I understand, in the Army under this get the same pay as in the Navy?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They will, if this is adopted.

Mr. MANN. Under this provision, I mean. How about when serving abroad?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The same exactly. They do not get any increase in pay on account of that. They get no increased pay for that.

Mr. MANN. Do they get the shore pay of the Navy?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Shore pay.

Mr. MANN. Even if serving abroad?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; even if serving abroad. The next amendment refers to increase of officers for detail to the National Guard and for other purposes. The House voted on that and fixed the number as 230—200 flat increase and 30 increase in the Quartermaster's Department. We have come to an agreement on that number of officers, leaving it as fixed by the House, but we further amended the provision by striking out the words as to the governors of each State and Territory and the District of Columbia, so that no officers shall be detailed to serve on the governor's staff or with any governor of a Territory or with the District with anything except the organization of the militia itself. In other words, the details now go direct to the regiments or battalions or the equivalent of the battalion.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The original Senate amendment provided for filling vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant, one-fifth in each year.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I was coming to that in a moment. We changed that to one-half, as the number is reduced from 612 to 230.

Mr. MANN. I was going to ask whether that was done because of the reduction in the number of officers.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is the reason. We changed that to one-half, because in place of 612 we have 230, and to extend the 200 over five years would be unreasonable and deprive the militia of the object which we have in granting this number of officers.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will not this result in all of the 200 being drawn from civil life and not from West Point or the enlisted men?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; the proportion of each year will be less than before. In other words, it takes two years now to fill up the 200, while before it took five years to fill up 612, less the 30 provided for the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. My point is West Point graduates now with the quota of enlisted men who receive commissions just about fill vacancies in the mobile branch of the Army, and yet if we add 100 each year the chances are that these will have to be filled from men in civil life.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. My impression is that this is better for filling from West Point than the original provision that we practically adopted in the House, which would apply to the 612. Now, as to the exact number required to fill the vacancies of the Regular Army during the next year, I do not know; I did not inquire into that. It will undoubtedly open up a chance for some second lieutenants from civil life, but I will say to my friend that there are a good many young men in civil life who are graduates of military schools, graduates of the military department of State universities, who are certified to the War Department as eligible to commissions in the Army, and they will undoubtedly have an opportunity for some of them to come in.

Now, it may extend the possibility of promotion of the enlisted men of the Army who have enlisted for the express purpose of getting a commission, and to my mind that man is one of the most valuable officers we are getting in the Army. He does not get the military training of West Point, to be sure, but he shows his love for the profession by his willingness to endure the hardships of a private soldier and keep up his studies until he passes the examination for the place.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think such an officer will be a better officer for the National Guard——

Mr. HAY. I desire to say to the gentleman from Iowa I wish to have some time.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman in a few minutes. Now, the next amendment is one over which there was a serious disagreement for a good while, which refers to the dental corps of the Army. There has been for years an effort made by the friends of the dental corps to give them commissions—rank in the Army. Up to this time they are simply contract dental surgeons. The Senate passed an amendment providing for a dental corps hereafter consisting of so many majors, so many captains, and so many first lieutenants. I do not believe that the corps should have this high rank. They are not assigned to troops; they are assigned to posts. They have their opportunity to discharge the work of their profession in connection with those posts and yet, in view of the standing of the corps and all things considered, we believe they should have some rank. In this amendment we give them the grade of first lieutenant. That starts them in with pay at $2,000 a year. They are now getting $1,800 a year. It gives them for 20 years' service 40 per cent increase in the pay.

making $2,800 a year, and the committee, on the part of the House at least, was unanimously of the opinion that that was a good deal of recognition for their services.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What allowances?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They have the allowances of a first lieutenant—three rooms and fuel and lights.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And commutation?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They do not have commutation except where quarters are not furnished.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They have light and fuel?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; but they do not get commutation for that. They do get commutation of quarters when quarters are not furnished.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But they do get all of these advantages.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Now, Mr. Speaker, I realize the Committee on Naval Affairs has already reported a bill and which is now pending on the calendar, giving the dental surgeons of the Navy the rank that is asked for in the Senate amendment to this bill; that is, to make them majors, captains, and lieutenants, but I sincerely hope that if the House adopts this conference report and settles this controversy, which has been extending for the last 10 years practically, that it will stop it all and not allow this branch of the service to go to the higher rank.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But the gentleman realizes there will be a demand just the same and continual pressure.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Absolutely; but my judgment is if this is settled here now it will end the controversy for the next 20 years.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Will the gentleman tell me why it is he uses as an argument that the paymaster's clerk gets rank in the Navy and he denies it to this branch of the service?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that the Congress of the United States has not yet given the rank asked for by the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is not the law. If it were the law, while I would regard it as going way beyond what the Congress should do, yet I would say at once that, in justice to the two branches of the service, they ought to be kept on an equality with each other.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Now, after a service of 20 years, what rank——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They will be first lieutenants yet. They would be getting pay of $2,800, and they would retire at a salary of $2,100 a year.

Mr. O'CONNELL. I understood from the gentleman from New Jersey that it provided a retired rank of major.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It does not. That is the Senate amendment.

Mr. O'CONNELL. I understand this is a bill introduced, practically, by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It has no provision of that kind in it, at all, and has never had, as introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey.

I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to occupy the time of the House on this report, because I believe it is the best that we can do, and it should be agreed to by the House. But the Secretary of War has seen fit to address a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs calling in question certain statements made by me when the conference report on the Army appropriation bill was under consideration; and the gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the committee, has published the letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The Secretary of War addressed this communication to the gentleman from Iowa, in which he undertakes to refute an argument which I made on the floor of the House, and, among other things, he says:

> I have the honor to say that the statement as printed was apparently misleading, as indicated by the debate which followed, and I submit the following memorandum which, in my opinion, more fully presents the facts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I pass by the questionable taste displayed by the Secretary in calling in question statements made by a Member of this House in debate, and if I had been guilty of misleading the House, as he charges, I would certainly not question his right to correct me, which he could have done by addressing his letter to me and not to a third person.

Now, let us see who is misleading the House, the Secretary of War or myself.

At a hearing of the Chief of Staff of the Army before the Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, on a bill (H. R. 29496) to increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, and for other purposes, the following colloquy took place:

> Mr. STEVENS. You have at the present time, as I recall it, in round numbers, about 400 officers detailed at schools as instructors, or in one way or another connected with schools. Is that number too large, all around?
> Gen. WOOD. Two hundred and ninety-three is the total we have. I do not think this number too large.

With a view to obtaining more definite information relative to the details of these officers, I requested the Adjutant General, on February 15, 1911, to furnish information—> as to the number of officers now absent from their commands on detached service either as instructors or as students at military or civil educational institutions.

In compliance with this request the Adjutant General submitted the following letter and tabular statement:

> WAR DEPARTMENT,
> THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
> Washington, February 15, 1911.
> Hon. JAMES HAY,
> House of Representatives.
> DEAR SIR: In response to your personal request of to-day for information as to the number of officers now absent from their commands on detached service, either as instructors or as students at military or civil educational institutions, I have the honor to transmit herewith a tabular statement, compiled as of January 30, 1911, which gives the information that you desire.
>
> Very respectfully,
>
> F. C. AINSWORTH,
> The Adjutant General.

Officers of the Army who were absent from their commands on detached service, either as instructors or as students at schools, on January 30, 1911.

Where located.	Instructors.	Students.	Total.
Army War College	14	22	36
United States Military Academy	[1] 81	([2])	81
Army Service Schools, Fort Leavenworth, Kans.	22	67	89
Artillery School, Fort Monroe, Va.	14	40	54
Mounted Service School, Fort Riley, Kans.	9	24	33
Engineer School, Washington Barracks, D. C.	5	23	28
School of Musketry, Presidio of Monterey, Cal.	3		3
At schools in Europe		2	2
Student in Cornell University		1	1
Total	148	179	327
Instructors at civil educational institutions	64		64
Aggregate	212	179	391

[1] Does not include 6 other officers on detached duty there nor the 7 professors.
[2] 416 cadets were there Jan. 30, 1911.

From the foregoing official statement it will be seen that instead of there being 293 officers "detailed at schools as instructors, or in one way or another connected with schools," as stated by the Chief of Staff in his hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, there were actually 391 officers so detailed on January 30, 1911, not including 13 officers on duty at the Military Academy.

It will also be seen that the call made upon the Adjutant General and the response made by him to that call related exclusively to officers on detached service either as instructors or students at schools and had no relation to any students at those schools other than detailed officers. And the remarks made by me in the House of Representatives on February 16, in connection with this subject during consideration of the Army appropriation bill, referred exclusively to officers on detached service either as instructors or students at schools and had no relation to any students at those schools other than detailed officers.

The letter of the Secretary of War of February 18, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 23, 1911, is misleading in that it confuses the issue, and apparently endeavors to discredit the official statement made by the Adjutant General and the remarks made by me in connection therewith by bringing in a lot of figures concerning enlisted men on duty or under instruction at various schools, including the School for Cooks and Bakers and the School for Horseshoers and Farriers. These figures are valueless as a basis upon which to attempt to discredit the statement made by me or the official report upon which that statement was based, because both the statement and the report referred exclusively to detailed officers. And if these figures with regard to enlisted men are as far from correct as are the figures that were given by the Chief of Staff at his hearing before the House Military Committee with regard to detailed officers, they are misleading as well as irrelevant. The production of these figures suggests the making of a somewhat searching inquiry with regard to the many Army schools, the number of which appears to be constantly increasing, and I hope that in the not-distant future there will be an opportunity to make such an inquiry with a reasonable prospect of corrective action being taken as a result of it if such action is found to be necessary. [Applause.]

As I said before, I regret that the Secretary of War has seen fit to question a statement made by me in debate on this floor.

I can excuse it, because doubtless the Secretary derived his inspiration and his information from those who are advocating this legislation and who, in their eagerness to persuade Members to vote for it, have neglected their duties in the War Department and have spent their time in buttonholing Members [applause], and have finally induced the Secretary of War to write a letter which does not convince and shows a lack of familiarity with the subject, which, to say the least of it, is deplorable. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If no other Member desires time, I call for a vote.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like two or three minutes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I unfortunately was not in when the chairman made his statement about this conference report, but I understand the paymasters' clerks have been given a sort of status——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They are given the same status now as paymasters' clerks of the Navy.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, nor good red herring.

Mr. MANN. They are retired. That is all they want.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is it, exactly. They were after retirement. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, while I can not hope to see it, I believe the report of the conferees ought to be voted down. Something was said here by gentlemen, and it seemed to pass in a general way unchallenged, about the extraordinary skill required by these clerks.

Now, as a matter of fact, there is no extraordinary skill required for the discharge of the work that is lodged upon the paymasters' clerks. It is the simplest and most primitive form of calculation. All they need is to have men who are capable of making the simplest calculations in figures, and disbursing that money honestly. It was suggested that we would suffer the misfortune of losing the services of these gentlemen after a few years because they would get better places. Well, sir, if we could by law fix it so that after they had had the advantage of this position for a little while, a temporary bridge to lead them to something better, the very best service we could render them would be to so change the law that they would get out of this service and go into commercial walks, where the rewards are certainly better than the privilege of being retired with the rank of a first lieutenant and ultimate pay, as the chairman suggests, of about $2,800 a year.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not for paymasters' clerks.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They get first lieutenant's pay, do they not?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Two thousand dollars is the limit. They start in at $1,125 a year.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It makes the argument all the stronger, then. I am not impeaching the character or the capacity of the clerks at all. But I only say in the interests of the people that this legislation is not needed, and in the interests of good administration it is not required; and while it is always an exceedingly difficult thing and, in a way, an unpleasant thing to oppose these conference reports, I believe the best we could do would be to vote down this feature of the report and continue operating the office of the paymasters' clerks on the basis it has heretofore been operated on.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know that the gentleman has given military matters a great deal of consideration. Will he kindly enlighten the committee with his views as to the dental surgeons? Is that legislation necessary?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I spoke very fully on that subject the other day in an endeavor to make myself perfectly plain. I am not in favor of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I presume the gentleman's opposition to this measure is along the lines of his position as expressed the other day?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No. It is a compromise.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the chairman of the committee yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did I understand the chairman in his preliminary statement to say that the Navy has placed dental surgeons on the retired list?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; I say they have reported a bill which is on the calendar for that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. I presume that so far as placing dental surgeons in the Army on the retired list is concerned, the Navy will follow the gentleman's recommendation with respect to the Army?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; it is probable.

Mr. STAFFORD. What has the gentleman to say as to placing them on the active list with a retirement feature?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I assume that unless you make their service a limited one they ought to have retired pay. When they get old they sacrifice the emoluments of a professional career to the service of the Army. My judgment is that the compromise we made with the Senate makes the dental corps of the Army sufficiently attractive for the brightest and best young dentists from the fact that they will know that when they are 64 years of age they will be taken care of, whereas if they are first-class dentists in a good large town they might be more successful for the time being, but they would be obliged to accumulate more of a competency while in active practice.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the provision provide for a greater number?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; it only provides that additions can be made to the contract corps as the law may hereafter provide.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the law provide for an increase of their salaries?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. It just gives them the retirement feature?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; it gives them an increase of pay after 10 years' service.

Mr. DALZELL. Do they get an increased rate at any time?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not until after 10 years of service.

Mr. DALZELL. They then go on the retired list?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They will go on the retired list at 64 years of age if this passes.

Mr. DALZELL. Is there a limitation there as to those who are already in the service?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas will state it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, is it possible to have a division of this report, so as to have a separate vote on that feature of it which provides for the retirement of the paymasters' clerks?

The SPEAKER. The report must stand or fall as a whole, as the Chair understands it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I beg the Speaker's pardon. I did not catch his reply.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. He says it must stand or fall as a whole.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say one more word on this paymaster business. They now enter the service at $1,400 a year. They will enter this service under this provision at $1,125 a year. The gentleman refers to the fact that it would be a good thing if they went out——

Mr. SLAYDEN. A good thing for them.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not think it would be a good thing for the Government. The Paymaster General reports that in the last few months a great many of them have gone out. I hope this report will be adopted and the bill enacted into law, and that the Congress of the United States will have placed a limitation on the fight that is being made along other lines for increased rank, which, in my judgment, the adoption of this report will have the effect of doing.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I entirely agree with the gentleman, and I hope that this feature of the proposed legislation—this feature which I believe to be utterly wrong—will be defeated. But does the gentleman think that the hope now held out to these people is such as to inspire the ambition of energetic young men with respect to position and pay? I am speaking of the Pay Corps.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think so. The compensation is better than that which the average bookkeeper receives now.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is not better than the average bookkeeper hopes to make.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SLAYDEN) there were, 122 ayes and 16 noes.

So the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HULL of Iowa a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the attempt to increase the postal rates on second-class mail matter, I desire to print in the RECORD the newspaper reports of a large mass meeting recently held in Cooper Union, New York City, to protest against any increase in postage on magazines and periodicals. These reports speak eloquently against the imposition of raising the tax on education. I send the matter to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have it read in my time as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the United States Senators and Congressmen.

GENTLEMEN: We beg to submit for your careful consideration the newspaper accounts of the greatest demonstration ever assembled in historic Cooper Union on Washington's Birthday.

We wish to enter a most earnest protest against the threatened loss of employment to those engaged in the manufacture of magazines and other educational literature in the event of an increase of postage rate now a part of the appropriation bill, making a cost of 4 cents a pound—300 per cent over the present rate—which would mean the nonemployment of many thousands of those now employed in the city of New York and throughout the United States.

Respectfully submitted.

JOINT CONFERENCE COMMITTEE OF THE MECHANICAL CRAFTS IN THE PRINTING TRADES.

[New York American, Thursday, Feb. 23, 1911.]

BIG MASS MEETING DENOUNCES HITCHCOCK RAID ON MAGAZINES—APPEAL IS MADE TO CONGRESS—MEN AND WOMEN WHO FILL COOPER UNION CHEER AS RESOLUTIONS ARE PASSED CALLING ON ALL REPRESENTATIVES TO STOP THE PROPOSED INCREASE IN POSTAGE RATES—PARCELS-POST LAW WOULD SOLVE ENTIRE PROBLEM, WRITES SULZER—JUDGE SNITKIN POINTS OUT DANGEROUS "JOKER" IN BILL MAKING POSTMASTER GENERAL A CENSOR AND ENABLING HIM TO KILL OFF PERIODICALS OR LET THEM CONTINUE PUBLICATION AT HIS PLEASURE.

Cooper Union was filled yesterday by men and women employed in the magazine industry, chiefly in the mechanical departments, to protest to Congress against the proposal to make up the postal deficit by quadrupling the rate of postage on popular magazines.

They gave up the best part of their holiday to this because, it was declared, the increase would drive half of the magazine printing force out of employment.

"Two-thirds of the printing in the United States is done in this vicinity," declared Bernard Nolan, who presided. "This is a joint convention of the mechanical crafts in the printing trade, and the 6,000 members of our league have met here because the purpose of the league is to further the general welfare of the printing trade, observing fairness alike to employer and employed."

He read this telegram from Congressman SULZER:

PARCELS POST WOULD SOLVE THE WHOLE PROBLEM.

"The proposed increase of postal rates is an imposition upon the people, absolutely unjustifiable as a matter of fair play, and absoluteiy unnecessary in view of the fact that if the Congress would pass my bill for a general parcels post there would be an increase of postal revenue of $50,000,000 a year. This amount would wipe out any postal deficit, reduce postage on all classes of mail matter, and justify a material advance in the salaries of our poorly paid letter carriers and postal employees."

"Give us a parcels post and all postal problems are solved."

He read this remarkable indorsement of the protest from Municipal Court Judge Snitkin, who, from his sick bed, sent a letter declaring:

"I wish to state that I consider the Post Office appropriation bill a pernicious measure in view of the fact that it contains a dangerous 'joker' in the shape of unjust and illegal discrimination against periodicals.

"This un-American measure, if enacted into law, virtually means the financial extinction of some publishers and loss of employment to numberless men and women.

"MAKES POSTMASTER GENERAL A CENSOR.

"This pernicious measure constitutes the Postmaster General a censor, and clothes him with dangerous powers to kill or let live many magazines at his pleasure.

"This measure means the muzzling or annihilation of the progressive, outspoken periodical.

"This bill would make splendid legislation in Russia, but it is diabolical legislation in free America."

R. Hoe & Co. sent word that they already had put themselves on record at Washington as being opposed to the increase.

Frank H. Stevens pointed out that if to meet the increase magazines were forced to advance their prices, "down will go the circulation, and out of employment will go half the help."

He gave this concrete example of what would result: There was a high-class weekly which weighed three copies to the pound. The proposed rates would increase the postage three times the present cost, and while the weekly might be making $200,000 a year now, employing thousands of men and women, that profit would be wiped out and a deficit created. This deficit could be met only by wholesale dismissal of employees.

WOULD INVOLVE LABOR TROUBLES, TOO.

J. J. Keppler, international vice president of the International Association of Machinists, made the point that injustice would be done to hundreds of thousands of his fellow machinists "who are employed under agreements between employers and labor organizations."

"Congress should not make a law that would do violence to existing contracts," he said. "If through this measure a reduction of wages shall be involved to pay for the shortcomings of the postal service, conciliation and arbitration will be necessarily sought by our labor commissioner to avoid strife or possible strike."

John P. Mines, ex-president of the Press Feeder's Union, told the assemblage that if the Post Office needs more money it should, instead of taxing a product and injuring labor, reduce the price paid to railroads for carrying the mails.

"That price," he explained, "is now in excess of what is charged to the citizen for similar service."

Amidst ringing cheers resolutions were adopted to be sent to Congress. They represented the alarm felt over the proposed postal increase, because it "would drive many magazines out and lessen the field of labor. We call upon all Members of Congress to oppose this increase."

PRINTERS SIDE WITH MAGAZINES—1,500 DELEGATES OF TRADE UNIONS OPPOSE INCREASED POSTAGE BILL.

The bill before Congress providing for a large increase in the postal rates on magazines was unsparingly condemned yesterday afternoon in Cooper Union in a joint conference of the mechanical crafts in the printing trades. Fifteen hundred representatives of printing trades unions were present.

A resolution was passed unanimously calling on all Representatives and Senators to vote against the measure, which, it was asserted, would practically destroy the magazine industry and deprive hundreds of thousands of men and women in the printing trades of the means of earning livelihoods. The resolution expressed the belief of the workers in the printing industry that the Post Office Department can devise other means of overcoming the postal deficit.

"If the present bill increasing the postal rates on magazines becomes a law it will drive 50 per cent of the magazines out of business," said Bernard Nolan, of Pressman's Union No. 51, who presided. "Besides," he continued, "such a law would place a power in the hands of the Postmaster General that practically would permit him to pass on the existence of many of the magazines."

In a telegram indorsing the object of the meeting, Representative SULZER said the proposed increase in magazine postal rates is unjustifiable. The parcels-post bill which SULZER has introduced, he said, would solve the problem of the postal deficit. The arguments in favor of the increased-rate bill, the Representative wired, "would make a horse laugh and America hide its head in shame." Many other telegrams indorsing the meeting were received, including one from Sophie Irene Loeb, suffragist leader, who indorsed the parcels-post bill.

[New York Times.]

UNIONS OPPOSE POSTAGE BILL—WORKERS IN PRINTING TRADES PASS RESOLUTIONS AGAINST IT.

Four unions were represented yesterday afternoon at a meeting in Cooper Union called by the joint conference of the Mechanical Crafts in the Printing Trades to protest against the bill before Congress increasing the postage on magazines. The joint conference represents Pressmen's Union, No. 51; Webb Pressmen's Union, No. 25; Franklin Association of Press Feeders, No. 23; and the Job Press Feeders' Union. Delegates from district No. 15, of the International Association of Machinists, who work in the manufacture of printing presses, were also present.

Letters and telegrams were received from a number of well-known men. One telegram was from Congressman SULZER, in which he denounced the bill, and said that the proposed increase in postal rates would be an unjustifiable imposition on the people of the United States in view of the fact that if his bill for a general parcels post was passed it would more than meet the deficit in the Post Office Department. He said that the arguments adduced in favor of the bill to increase postage were enough "to make a horse laugh."

A letter was read from Robert Hoe, of Robert Hoe & Co., in which he said that his firm sympathized with the object of the meeting and had gone on record at Washington as being opposed to the bill to increase the postage rates.

Resolutions protesting against the bill were adopted.

PRINTERS IN POSTAL FIGHT—MASS MEETING CONDEMNS INCREASE OF MAGAZINE MAIL RATES.

New York printers, in mass meeting at Cooper Union yesterday, warmly condemned the proposed increase of postal rates on magazines.

The following unions were represented: Pressmen's Union No. 51, Web Pressmen's Union No. 25, Franklin Association of Press Feeders No. 23, the Job Press Feeders' Union, and the printing press branch of District No. 15 of the International Association of Machinists.

Bernard Nolan, of Pressmen's Union No. 51, presided. Among the speakers were John P. Mines, of the Franklin Association, and John J. Keppler, vice president of the International Association of Machinists.

UNIONS OPPOSE POSTAL BILL—MEETING OF PRESSMEN AND FEEDERS TO PUT THE TRADES ON RECORD.

The bill to increase the postage on magazines was condemned yesterday afternoon at a meeting in Cooper Union, called under the auspices of the joint conference of mechanical crafts in the printing trades representing four organizations. They are Pressmen's Union No. 51, Web Pressmen's Union No. 25, Franklin Association of Press Feeders No. 23, and the Job Press Feeders' Union. The branch of district No. 15 of the International Association of Machinists, whose members work in the manufacture of printing presses, was also represented.

Bernard Nolan, of Pressmen's Union No. 51, presided, and speeches condemnatory of the bill were made by John P. Mines, of the Franklin Association, and John J. Keppler, vice president of the International Association of Machinists. The chairman said that the bill if it became law would not only drive 50 per cent of the magazines out of business, but would place an amount of power in the hands of the Postmaster General which would make him the arbiter of the existence of many magazines.

Telegrams were received from Miss Sophie Irene Loeb, the suffragette leader; Congressman WILLIAM SULZER, and others regretting their inability to attend and condemning the bill. Miss Loeb said that the proper solution of the matter would be the establishment of a parcels post. Congressman SULZER in his telegram declared that the proposed increase in postal rates was an unjustifiable imposition and absolutely unnecessary in view of the fact that if Congress would pass his bill for a general parcels post there would be no postal deficit.

Letters were read from Robert Hoe, of Robert Hoe & Co., and from Municipal Court Justice Leonard A. Snitkin, expressing sympathy with the object of the meeting.

OPPOSE HIGHER POSTAGE—PRINTING-PRESS WORKMEN SIDE WITH THE MAGAZINES.

The proposed measure now before Congress increasing the rate of postage on magazines was opposed at a meeting yesterday afternoon in Cooper Union, called under the auspices of the joint conference of mechanical crafts in the printing trades, which was formed in December, to protest against the bill. The conference represents Pressmen's Union No. 51, Web Pressmen's Union No. 25, Franklin Association of Press Feeders No. 23, and the Job Press Feeders' Union. Representatives of the lodge of District No. 15 of the International Association of Machinists, whose members work at the manufacturing of printing presses, were also at the meeting.

The following resolution, a copy of which will be sent to every member of Congress, was adopted:

"Whereas we view with alarm the proposed increase of postal rates of the country pertaining to the magazines, periodicals, etc., now under discussion before the Senate; and

"Whereas such increase, if put into effect, will, to a certain extent, destroy this industry and thereby will deprive hundreds of thousands of men and women in our industry of employment; and

"Whereas we, the workers in the printing industry, believe that the Post Office Department can devise other means to overcome its deficit: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the measure of increased postal rates is condemned, and that we call upon all Representatives, Senators, and Congressmen on behalf of our industry to vote against such a measure."

MAGAZINE TAX DENOUNCED AT MASS MEETING.

Resolutions adopted at the Cooper Union mass meeting of men and women employed in the magazine industry, protesting against the proposed increase in postage on magazines, to-day were sent to Congress.

"Two-thirds of the printing in the United States is done in this vicinity," declared Bernard Nolan, who presided at the mass meeting. "This is a joint convention of the mechanical crafts in the printing trade, and the 6,000 members of our league have met here because the purpose of the league is to further the general welfare of the printing trade, observing fairness alike to employer and employed."

He read this telegram from Congressman SULZER:

"The proposed increase of postal rates is an imposition upon the people, absolutely unjustifiable as a matter of fair play, and absolutely unnecessary in view of the fact that if the Congress would pass my bill for a general parcels post there would be an increase of postal revenue of $50,000,000 a year. This amount would wipe out any postal deficit, reduce postage on all classes of mail matter, and justify a material advance in the salaries of our poorly paid letter carriers and postal employees."

RUSSIAN LEGISLATION.

"Give us a parcels post and all posts problems are solved," said Mr. Nolan.

He read this remarkable indorsement of the protest from Municipal Court Judge Snitkin, who from his sick bed sent a letter declaring:

"I wish to state that I consider the Post Office appropriation bill a pernicious measure, in view of the fact that it contains a dangerous 'joker' in the shape of unjust and illegal discrimination against periodicals.

"This un-American measure, if enacted into law, virtually means the financial extinction of some publishers and loss of employment to numberless men and women.

"This pernicious measure constitutes the Postmaster General a censor and clothes him with dangerous powers to kill or let live many magazines at his pleasure.

"This measure means the muzzling or annihilation of the progressive, outspoken periodical.

"This bill would make splendid legislation in Russia, but it is diabolical legislation in free America."

R. Hoe & Co. sent word that they already had put themselves on record at Washington as being opposed to the increase.

Frank H. Stevens pointed out that if, to meet the increase, magazines were forced to advance their prices, "down will go the circulation and out of employment will go half the help."

He gave this concrete example of what would result: There was a high-class weekly which weighed three copies to the pound. The proposed rates would increase the postage three times the present cost, and while the weekly might be making $200,000 a year now, employing thousands of men and women, that profit would be wiped out and a deficit created. This deficit could be met only by wholesale dismissal of employees.

WOULD INVOLVE LABOR TROUBLES.

J. J. Keppler, international vice president of the International Association of Machinists, made the point that injustice would be done to hundreds of thousands of his fellow-machinists "who are employed under agreements between employers and labor organizations."

Congress should not make a law that would do violence to existing contracts, he said. "If through this measure a reduction of wages shall be involved to pay for the shortcomings of the postal service, conciliation and arbitration will be necessarily sought by our labor commissioner to avoid strife or possible strike."

John P. Mines, ex-president of the Pressfeeders' Union, told the assemblage that if the post office needs more money, it should, instead of taxing a product and injuring labor, reduce the price paid to railroads for carrying the mails.

"That price," he explained, "is now in excess of what is charged by the citizen for similar service."

Amidst ringing cheers resolutions were adopted. They represented the alarm felt over the proposed postal increase, because it "would drive many magazines out and lessen the field of labor. We call upon all Members of Congress to oppose this increase."

The Cooper Union meeting was held under the auspices of the Joint Conference of Mechanical Crafts in the Printing Trades, which represents Pressmen's Union No. 51, Web Pressmen's Union No. 25, Franklin Association of Press Feeders, No. 23, and the Job Press Feeders' Union. Representatives of District No. 15, of the International Association of Machinists, were also present. The following resolution was unanimouly adopted:

"Whereas we view with alarm the proposed increase of postal rates of the country pertaining to the magazines, periodicals, etc., now under discussion before the Senate; and

"Whereas such increase, if put into effect, will, to a certain extent, destroy this industry, and thereby will deprive hundreds of thousands of men and women in our industry of employment; and

"Whereas we, the workers in the printing industry, believe that the Post Office Department can devise other means to overcome its deficit: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the measure of increased postal rates is condemned, and that we call upon all Representatives, Senators, and Congressmen, on behalf of our industry, to vote against such a measure.

"COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS.

"E. W. Edwards, Fred. Scudder, James Horan, Martin Broderick, William Konfeld, Web Pressmen's Union No. 25; John A. Kenney, Fred. Wagner, Thomas Conners, Terry McGough, Frank Dowling, Printing Pressmen's Union No. 51; John P. Mines, James D. Kelley, John J. Clark, John J. Shannon, Herman Hoch, Franklin Union, No. 23; Thomas Henry, Job Press Feeders' Union No. 1; John J. Keppler, George Stilgenbauer, E. J. Deering, George Heetzel, District No. 15, International Association of Machinists; Bernard Nolan, chairman; John J. Dowling, secretary."

Among the many letters and telegrams received by the committee were the following:

From Dr. William Irving Sirovich, 539 East Sixth Street, New York, magazine reader:

"To Mr. BERNARD NOLAN:

"Regret exceedingly that professional engagements incapacitate me from addressing your mass meeting in Cooper Union. What nutrition is to the body, what heat and energy is to our system, so the reading of healthy magazines is to the mind of the reading public. And to practice economy by increasing the postage on healthy magazines that breed good citizenship and pure motherhood is an indirect step in throttling public opinion and debauching the reading and critical public. To develop the mind and body, to scan the heavens, to study the geological strata and formation of the earth, to create literature, to resurrect the thoughts of dead and forgotten races and languages, to carve the hidden ideas of the brain in marble and statue, to portray the imagination of the brain in painting, to delve into the depths of the hidden and concealed, to inculcate the love of one's country, to expose corruption and extravagance in government, is all the province of literature as exemplified in the writings of good magazines. And as a reader of all the healthy periodicals, I strenuously object to their destruction and annihilation through an increased tax on their postage duties. As Rudyard Kipling said: 'Remove the advertisements and you destroy half the interest of the magazine.' May the time never come when through the guise of economy the liberty of a free press, through magazines, should be destroyed, while extravagance is flying rampant in every department.

"Very respectfully, yours,

"WILLIAM IRVING SIROVICH, M. D."

Telegram from Congressman SULZER, the consistent advocate of the people's rights:

"BERNARD NOLAN, Esq.,

"Chairman Mass Meeting, Cooper Union, New York City:

"I am in sympathy with the purpose of your meeting to protest against the increase of postage on magazines and periodicals. Regret, on account official duties here, I can not be with you to address the meeting. The proposed increase of postal rates is an imposition on the people. Absolutely unjustifiable as a matter of fair play and absolutely unnecessary in view of the fact that if Congress would pass my bill for a general parcels post there would be an increase in postal revenue of $50,000,000 a year, an amount sufficient to wipe out any postal deficit, reduce postage on all classes of mail matter, and justify a material advance in the salaries of our poorly paid letter carriers and postal employees. When all the facts are considered, the pretense of the Post Office Department is enough to make a horse laugh and patriotic America hang its head in sadness and humiliation. Give us a general parcels post and all postal problems are solved in the interest and for the benefit of all the people.

"WILLIAM SULZER."

From Congressman FRANCIS BURTON HARRISON:

"DEAR SIR: I thank you most cordially for your invitation to attend the meeting at Cooper Union to-morrow afternoon, which invitation has just reached me. Unfortunately, it is not possible for me to get away from Washington at this time. During the last 10 days of the session every Representative is on duty down here and, as you know, Washington's birthday is a workday for us just the same as all other days.

"With much regard, I am,

"Yours, very truly, FRANCIS BURTON HARRISON."

From United States Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE:

"DEAR SIR: I have your letter of yesterday, inviting me to attend the mass meeting to be held at Cooper Union to-morrow protesting against the proposed postal increase for second-class matter.

"I regret that because of legislative duties it will be impossible for me to attend.

"Respectfully, yours, ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE."

Telegram from Sophie Irene Loeb, magazine writer:

"The proposed increase of postal rate on magazines will eventually destroy one of America's best educational features. If our Government would adopt a parcels-post system for its citizens, the same as it has by treaty with foreign governments, we would have a surplus instead of a deficit. Protest vigorously against any restriction on education or loss of employment of men and women now engaged in the magazine industry.

"SOPHIE IRENE LOEB."

From Senator GORE, the People's Rights Senator, from Oklahoma:

"CHAIRMAN COOPER UNION MEETING.

"DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your favor of recent date inviting me to be present at Cooper Union on February 22. I regret to say that your invitation did not come to my personal attention until this moment, which explains, and I trust will excuse, my delay in answering. It would have afforded me great pleasure to attend the meeting to which you referred.

"With best wishes, I am,

"Yours, very truly, T. P. GORE."

SHERIDAN RAILWAY & LIGHT CO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 9903) to authorize the Sheridan Railway & Light Co. to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, telephone, electric power, and trolley line through Fort Mackenzie Military Reservation, and for other purposes, with House amendments disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HULL of Iowa, Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, and Mr. HAY.

FORT D. A. RUSSELL MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 9904) granting certain rights of way on the Fort D. A. Russell Military Reservation at Cheyenne, Wyo., for railroad and county road purposes, with House amendments disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked for.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HULL of Iowa, Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, and Mr. HAY.

CERTIFIED CHECKS FOR DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 30570) to authorize the receipt of certified checks on national banks for duties on imports and internal taxes, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

LOCATION OF OIL AND GAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 32344) to protect locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States or their successors in interest, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask what is the effect of these Senate amendments?

Mr. NEEDHAM. This bill, as it passed the House, excepted land under any withdrawal, and the Senate amendments confine the exception or proviso to mineral withdrawals. As the law is now, on land withdrawn like national forests you can carry on mining, and the bill as it passed the House would stop that. This amendment of the Senate is to correct that, and refers to mineral withdrawals so as to make the bill logical and as it was intended when it passed the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not affect lands withdrawn for other purposes?

Mr. NEEDHAM. This amendment was agreed to in the Committee on the Public Lands, and I was requested to make this motion on behalf of my colleague Mr. SMITH, of the Committee on the Public Lands, who has gone home quite ill.

The motion was agreed to.

VALLEY PAPER CO. V. DONNELLY, PUBLIC PRINTER.

By unanimous consent, on the request of Mr. COOPER, of Pennsylvania, leave was granted to print in the RECORD the following decision of Mr. Justice Gould, of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sustaining the demurrer of defendant in the matter of the Valley Paper Co., plaintiff, v. Samuel B. Donnelly, Public Printer.

[In the supreme court of the District of Columbia. In equity, No. 29461.]

THE VALLEY PAPER CO. V. PUBLIC PRINTER.

Fred B. Rhodes, attorney for plaintiff.

Clarence R. Wilson, United States attorney for the District of Columbia; Reginal S. Huidekoper, assistant United States attorney for the District of Columbia; and Frank E. Elder, special assistant to the Attorney General, attorneys for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT.

The plaintiff's bill recites that it is a corporation under the laws of the State of Massachusetts and "a taxpayer of the United States," and that the defendant is the "United States Public Printer;" that in January, 1910, it submitted a proposal for supplying paper for the fiscal year ending February 28, 1911, to the Joint Committee on Printing at Washington, D. C., which was opened in the presence of six persons—to wit, REED SMOOT, JONATHAN BOURNE, jr., DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, GEORGE C. STURGISS, ALLEN F. COOPER, and DAVID E. FINLEY—and by them rejected, notwithstanding they "acted without authority or warrant of law, and to the injury and prejudice of the rights of complainant."

The bill next avers that the said persons were never appointed or had any authority to perform the duties imposed by law upon the Joint Committee on Printing; that "none" of them "were" ever appointed as members of said joint committee by either "the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or by any official in either House having authority to make such appointment."

The bill thereupon recites the provision of the act of Congress of August 26, 1852 (ch. 91, 10 Stat., 34), which provides: "There shall be a Joint Committee on Public Printing consisting of three Members of the Senate, appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House, who shall have the powers hereinafter stated;" that the duties and powers of said joint committee were enlarged by the act of January 12, 1895 (ch. 23, 28 Stat., 601), but that no change was made as to the manner of the appointment of said committee. It recites section 5 of said act, which requires the sealed proposals to furnish paper to be opened in the presence of the joint committee and the contracts to be awarded "to the lowest and best bidder for the interests of the Government;" but that no proposal shall be considered which is not accompanied by a bond approved by a judge or clerk of a court of record in the penalty of $5,000, etc.; and that the persons named required that bidders should give bond in the sum of $10,000; "complainant further avers that the said body acting as aforesaid awarded contracts for supplying paper for the public printing without in any case requiring the bond to be approved by a judge or clerk of a court of record, and that the bid of complainant was the only bid opened by that body, acting as aforesaid, which was accompanied by a bond approved by a judge or clerk of a court of record."

It is next alleged that under the act of March 2, 1895, it is provided that when no joint committee has been appointed the Committee on Printing either of the Senate or House then in existence shall act. As there was no Joint Committee on Printing in existence, complainant was entitled to have his bid considered by the Committee on Printing of the Senate, consisting of six members, and the Committee on Printing of the House, consisting of three members. Notwithstanding the rights of complainant to have his bid considered as aforesaid, said REED SMOOT, who without authority or appointment assumed to act as chairman of the body which opened and rejected the bid of complainant, refused to permit three members of the Senate Committee on Printing to sit with the body considering said bids, or to have any vote in determining whether or not complainant's bid should or should not be accepted, although requested so to do by one of said Members, to wit, Stephen B. Elkins, United States Senator from West Virginia. Complainant further shows that notwithstanding the fact that defendant has been advised that there has been no compliance with the provisions of the law hereinbefore referred to, providing for the performance of certain acts as a condition precedent to entering into any contract for paper for public printing, said defendant has persisted, to the injury and prejudice of the rights of complainant, in purchasing paper under certain alleged contracts with various firms which have not been approved by the Joint Committee on Printing or by any other persons or body authorized by law.

The special prayer is that the Public Printer "show cause why he should not be permanently restrained and enjoined from issuing any orders for paper for the public printing for year ending February 28, 1911, under contracts entered into as aforesaid."

The Public Printer interposed a demurrer to this bill, alleging some 11 reasons why it was bad in substance, and also a return to the rule issued thereon, in which he states, substantially—

First. That plaintiff's proposal failed to conform to the requirements of law, and when opened by the persons named in the bill, which persons comprised the Joint Committee on Printing, together with other proposals for supply of paper, was rejected, and the contracts were awarded to other firms who were the lowest and best bidders for the interests of the Government.

Second. That "the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives, consisting of GEORGE C. STURGISS, ALLEN F. COOPER, and DAVID E. FINLEY, were appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives to act as such Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives, and as members of the Joint Committee on Printing, and this defendant further says that the Committee on Printing of the Senate consisted of eight members, who were duly appointed in accordance with the rules of the Senate for selecting the personnel of committees, to wit, by the Committee on Committees, designated by the President of the Senate, whose recommendation in this regard was formally approved by the Senate of the United States; that in pursuance to the rules and regulations of the said Senate and by express resolution of said body of February 15, A. D. 1909, the said committee was constituted the Committee on Printing of the Senate, and the said REED SMOOT was appointed its chairman, with power and authority to select two of the members of the committee to act with him as members of the Joint Committee on Printing, and acting as aforesaid the said REED SMOOT did designate and select Senators JONATHAN BOURNE, jr., and DUNCAN U. FLETCHER to act with him as Senate representatives of the said joint committee; and the said REED SMOOT, being the chairman of the said Senate committee, was by force of the rules and regulations of said Congress duly constituted the chairman of the said Joint Committee on Printing, in strict accord with said rules and regulations, and in conformity to law; and this defendant further says that all of said acts were done by said committee in the composition of said committee and in performance of their duties as such Joint Committee on Printing in full accordance with law and within the scope of the authority of the legislative branch of the Government."

There are numerous additional defenses set forth in the return which need not be considered. The return is under oath.

By stipulation, the cause was heard on bill, rule to show cause issued thereon, return to said rule, and demurrer to the bill.

1. The first question naturally suggesting itself upon the face of plaintiff's bill is, By what right does plaintiff corporation claim injunctive protection of equity? It is alleged that plaintiff is a taxpayer of the United States; there is no allegation that its taxes will be increased if the Public Printer is not enjoined; there is not even such an inference in the bill. It is alleged that it was a bidder for the contracts let by the Joint Committee on Printing to certain unnamed and undisclosed competitors; there is no allegation that this action by the joint committee caused the plaintiff loss. There is no allegation that plaintiff corporation will be affected in any property or corporate right, in the slightest degree, by the continued issuance by the Public Printer of orders for paper for public use under the contracts entered into with its competitors. The gravamen of the bill is that certain officials acted without legal authority in awarding certain contracts to others than plaintiff. There is no contention in the bill that these officials ought to have awarded the contracts to plaintiff corporation and by not so doing caused it financial loss; the charge is that the aforesaid officials illegally usurped governmental functions; only this, and nothing more.

And for that reason, that an executive official, the Public Printer, should be enjoined from ordering paper under said contracts. To express the situation in other terms, the bill is an arraignment and criticism of certain Members of Congress who assumed to act as a Joint Committee on Printing when they had no title to such office, and the plaintiff, setting itself up as censor morum, asks equity to interfere with the acts of said committee, although said acts inflict no injury upon plaintiff or its property.

There is no such jurisdiction in equity. It deals only with property rights and with the maintenance of civil rights. The language of Mr. Justice Gray in the matter of Sawyer (124 U. S., 200) is often quoted:

"The office and jurisdiction of a court of equity, unless enlarged by express statute, are limited to the protection of rights of property."

And in the case of Green v. Mills (69 Fed., 852; 30 L. R. A., 90) Chief Justice Fuller, sitting in the circuit court of appeals, fourth circuit, used this language:

"It is well settled that a court of chancery is conversant only with matters of property and the maintenance of civil rights. The court has no jurisdiction in matters of a political nature, nor to interfere with the duties of any department of Government, unless under special circumstances and when necessary to the protection of rights of property, nor in matters merely criminal or merely immoral which do not affect any right of property."

In the case of People v. Byrd (98 Ga., 688), where an unsuccessful bidder secured an injunction in the lower court against the reporter of the Supreme Court prohibiting him from awarding a contract to one who was not the lowest bidder, the Supreme Court, in reversing the case, said:

"It results as a logical consequence from the foregoing that Byrd had no shadow of right to have the contract awarded to him, and therefore, in his attitude as a disappointed bidder, he had no legal cause of complaint with reference to the action taken in the premises by the governor and the reporter."

On page 693 the court continued:

"The only remaining question is, Did Byrd, in his capacity as citizen and taxpayer, have a right to institute in his own name an equitable proceeding against the reporter and the Franklin Co. for the purpose of testing the legality of the contract which the reporter, with the governor's consent and approval, had made with that company or obtaining an injunction preventing the said contract from being carried into effect? He could not do this, for several reasons. In the first place, the State, being a party to the contract, would be a necessary party to such a cause; and it could not without its express consent be subjected to any kind of action. * * * A contract to which the State is a party can not be annulled without having the State before the court; and, as Byrd could not make the State a party to this proceeding, this would be sufficient to end the matter.

"But, secondly, the injunction granted necessarily operated against the governor of the State, not eo nomine, because he is not a party to the record, but practically because it suspends the operation of the contract which he participated officially in making. In Mayo v. Renfroe (66 Ga., 427) this court said: 'The governor could not be made a party. Being head of a coordinate branch of the Government, the courts may not well enjoin him. Equity, as well as law, would seem to forbid it * * *.'

"And, thirdly, even if obstacles above pointed out were not in Byrd's way, he was not, as a mere taxpayer, entitled to maintain his petition, because he utterly failed to show that, as such, he was in any way injured by the letting of the contract to the Franklin Co. It was, in any event, absolutely essential for him to show that, in consequence of the action taken by the governor and the reporter, he, as a private citizen, sustained some injury. It is difficult to conceive how, in this capacity, he could have been injured at all, except by an increase in the amount of his State taxes; and as to this there was no contention, nor even a pretense, that the publication of the Supreme Court reports by the Franklin Co. would cost the State a single cent more than would have been the case if the contract had been awarded to Byrd himself or to some one else. He was not in a position to insist, and did not insist, that the State could, in any event, get the work done at a price less than his own bid."

In the case of World's Columbian Exposition v. United States (6 C. C. A., 58) a bill was filed seeking an injunction against the appellees to prevent the opening of the world's fair on Sunday, averring that such opening would be "of great injury and grievous prejudice to the common good and the welfare of the people of the United States." In dismissing the bill Chief Justice Fuller said:

"The office and jurisdiction of a court of equity, unless enlarged by express statute, are limited to the protection of rights of property. The court is conversant only with questions of property and the maintenance of civil rights, and exercises no jurisdiction in matters merely political, legal, criminal, or immoral."

In Cicero Lumber Co. v. Cicero (176 Ill., 9), the court said:

"The general rule is that when the duty about to be violated by the corporation or its officers is public in its nature and affects all the inhabitants alike, one not suffering any special injury can not in his own name or by uniting with others maintain a bill for an injunction. A private individual can not maintain a bill to enjoin a breach of public trust without showing that he will be specially injured thereby."

This citation of cases might be greatly extended. (See Roosevelt v. Draper, 23 N. Y., 318; Miller v. Grandy, 13 Mich., 540; State ex rel. Taylor v. Lord, 28 Oreg., 498.) It is sufficient to say, however, that with a few discordant opinions (see McCollough v. Brown, 41 S. C., 220; 23 L. R. A., 410) the great weight of judicial authority sustains the proposition that equity will interfere by the extraordinary writ of injunction only when the suitor shows a special and irreparable injury to himself or his property different from that which will be sustained by others similarly situated.

There is another consideration, possibly a corollary to that stated, which bars plaintiff's relief. The law regulating the issuance of injunctions by an equity court is a law of proportions; that is to say, unless the court is satisfied that the relief sought is essential to protect property interests of the plaintiff more important in law than the restrained rights of the defendant, the remedy will not be applied. This principle was exemplified by the Supreme Court in the case of Wilson v. Shaw (204 U. S., 24), where a suit was brought by a citizen and taxpayer of Illinois to prevent the construction of the Panama Canal. The court said:

"Clearly there is no merit in the complainant's contention. That, generally speaking, a citizen may be protected against wrongful acts of the Government affecting him or his property may be conceded. That his remedy is by injunction does not follow. A suit for an injunction is an equitable proceeding and the interests of the defendant are to be considered as well as those of the complainant."

So in this case the court should consider the relative injury to the parties if the Public Printer should be enjoined from buying paper under the assailed contracts. As already stated, there is no showing that the plaintiff will suffer any injury, while it is fairly inferable that substantial injury might befall the Government if the Public Printer were enjoined from purchasing his paper supply under the contracts heretofore made. It might even happen that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD could not be printed.

2. There is another reason why plaintiff's bill can not be sustained. It seeks to destroy rights which certain unnamed persons or corporations have acquired under contracts with certain officials of the Government. These persons or corporations are not made defendants to the litigation. That their rights can not be adjudicated without their presence is clear from the decisions of the Supreme Court. (New Orleans Water Works v. New Orleans, 164 U. S., 471; California v. So. Pac. Co., 157 U. S., 229.)

The State courts coincide. In Hoppock v. Chambers (96 Mich., 509), the court said:

"This is a bill by certain taxpayers of the village of Frankfort to restrain the payment of moneys under a contract entered into in May, 1900, by the council with George L. Davis, trustee, for a water supply to said village. After the execution of said contract a corporation was formed, which succeeded to all the rights of said George L. Davis, under said contract.

"The bill is fatally defective, in that neither said Davis nor said corporation, so succeeding to his rights, is made a party defendant thereto. All the parties in interest, and whose rights may be affected, ought to be made parties. * * * The other parties to the contract in question would not be concluded by any decree herein, and the village, in case of a decree against it, would be subject to still further litigation."

(See also Hope v. Mayor, 72 Ga., 246; Hutchinson v. Burr, 12 Cal., 103; Hardy v. Bank, 46 Kans., 88.)

3. It is also contended by plaintiff that the body designated as the Joint Committee on Printing, which rejected its bid and accepted the bids under which contracts were made, was illegally constituted and exercised its functions without authority of law. This contention may be briefly summarized as claiming that section 12 of the act of August 26, 1852 (10 Stat., 30), is still in force. This section provides:

"SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That a committee, consisting of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House of Representatives, shall be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, to be called the Joint Committee on Printing, which committee shall have a right to decide," etc. This provision was embodied in section 3756 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

In 1895 Congress attempted to codify the laws relating to public printing. The act of January 12, 1895 (28 Stat., 601), was entitled: "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents."

The first section of this act reads:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be a Joint Committee on Printing, consisting of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House of Representatives, who shall have the powers hereinafter stated."

This section differs from section 12 of the act of 1852 in that it eliminates the provisions regulating the appointment of the joint committee and leaves that body to be constituted as the rules of the Senate and House may from time to time prescribe.

While it is true that repeals by implication are not favored, it is equally well established, to quote the language of the Supreme Court in District of Columbia v. Hutton (143 U. S., 18):

"Where two acts are not in express terms repugnant, yet if the latter act covers the whole subject of the first, and embraces new provisions, plainly showing that it was intended as a substitute for the first act, it will operate as a repeal of that act."

That the act of January 12, 1895, was intended to "cover the whole subject" of the public printing and to be a substitute for all prior legislation upon the subject is manifest from an examination of the records of Congress, including the reports of the several committees which had the matter in charge. While the Supreme Court has held that the debates of Congress are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of statutes passed by that body, it has also held that the courts may resort to the reports of committees of either branch of Congress with a view of determining the scope of statutes passed on the strength of such reports. (Burns v. U. S., 194 U. S., 486.)

Resorting to this approved source of information, it is first noted that by a concurrent resolution of February 9, 1891, there was appointed a joint committee of the Senate and House with instructions to examine into the general subject of public printing and binding, and to report a bill in the following December. This committee formulated a bill which, with some amendments, passed both Houses during the Fifty-second Congress, but failed of final enactment because of a disagreement of the Senate to certain House amendments. The bill, as drawn by the joint committee, was a codification and reenactment of the numerous provisions of the existing law regulating public printing and binding; it, however, contained many new sections. A full and elaborate report of this joint committee is contained in Senate Report No. 18, Fifty-second Congress, first session. This report also contains a copy of the bill proposed, together with an explanation as to each section of the said bill.

Section 1 of the proposed bill provided that—

"There shall be a Joint Committee on Printing, consisting of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House of Representatives, and shall have the powers hereinafter stated."

The reasons assigned by the committee for the enactment of this section were as follows:

"This is nearly identical with section 3756 of the Revised Statutes of 1878 (act date of Aug. 26, 1852). The change is an unimportant one, leaving out that the Joint Committee on Printing shall be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House. The word 'public' is omitted, making the committee a Committee on Printing instead of a Committee on Public Printing. This change is made throughout the whole bill."

On September 12, 1893, Mr. Richardson, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Printing, submitted a report to the House accompanying House bill 2650 (53d Cong., 1st sess.), which bill was reported as a substitute bill, designated as the same as that reported by the Committee on Printing of the last House. The same explanation with reference to the change in the first section of the bill is given in this report as in the original report of the joint committee.

On July 24, 1894, Mr. Gorman, from the Committee on Printing, submitted a similar report to the Senate, which was intended to accompany House bill 2650, above referred to. The same language is again used for explaining the reasons of section 1 of the proposed bill. Both the Senate and House committees, in reporting the bill, made specific references to the omission from section 1 of the requirements that the Joint Committee on Printing should be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House. This bill was enacted into law, as heretofore stated, on January 12, 1895. From these reports it is manifest that the act of 1852, which provided for the appointment of the members of the joint committee by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, respectively, was intentionally changed by the language of the first section of the act of January 12, 1895. It is equally manifest from the history of this legislation that the intention of Congress was to codify, collect, and systematize the provisions of existing law upon the subject of public printing. The conclusion is irresistible that section 1 of the act of January 12, 1895, repealed so much of the existing law as regulated the manner in which the Joint Committee on Public Printing should be constituted. This conclusion is fully justified by the decision of the Supreme Court in District of Columbia v. Hutton, supra, and also by the decision of the same court in Murdock v. Memphis (20 Wall., 590), and United States v. Tynen (11 Wall., 88).

The result is that, under existing law, the appointment of the Joint Committee on Printing is left to the discretion of the Senate and House, as may be provided by their rules. The courts have no more power to pass upon the manner or method selected by the Senate or House for the appointment of such committee, or the regularity of the proceedings leading up to such appointment, than they would have to pass upon the regularity of the election of a Member of either House. Moreover, it appears from the return in this case, which in the present state of the record must be taken as true, that the House members of the joint committee were duly appointed by the Speaker to act as such, and that the Committee on Printing of the Senate consisted of eight members, who were duly appointed in accordance with the rules of the Senate; that in pursuance of said rules and by express resolution of the Senate, Senator SMOOT was appointed chairman of said committee, with power and authority to select two of the members of the committee to act with him as members of the Joint Committee on Printing, and that he did so select Senators BOURNE and FLETCHER. So that, even if the court had jurisdiction to inquire into the regularity of the appointment of the members of this joint committee, it could not reach any other conclusion than that the committee was constituted in accordance with the rules of the two bodies.

For the reason heretofore given, the demurrer to the bill will be sustained, with costs.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 30292) to change the name of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service to the Public Health Service, and to increase the pay of officers of said service, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States shall hereafter be known and designated as the Public Health Service, and all laws pertaining to the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States shall hereafter apply to the Public Health Service, and all regulations now in force, made in accordance with law for the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, shall apply to and remain in force as regulations of and for the Public Health Service until changed or rescinded. The Public Health Service may study and investigate the diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof, including sanitation and sewage and the pollution either directly or indirectly of the navigable streams and lakes of the United States, and it shall from time to time issue information in the form of bulletins and otherwise for the use of the public.

SEC. 2. That beginning with the 1st day of July next after the passage of this act the salaries of the commissioned medical officers of the Public Health Service shall be at the following rates per annum: Surgeon General, $6,000; Assistant Surgeon General, $4,000; senior surgeon, of which there shall be 10 in number, on active duty, $3,500; surgeon, $3,000; passed assistant surgeon, $2,400; assistant surgeon, $2,000; and the said officers, excepting the Surgeon General, shall receive an additional compensation of 10 per cent of the annual salary as above set forth for each five years' service, but not to exceed in all 40 per cent: Provided, That the total salary, including the longevity increase, shall not exceed the following rates: Assistant Surgeon General, $5,000; senior surgeon, $4,500; surgeon, $4,000: Provided further, That there may be employed in the Public Health Service such help as may be provided for from time to time by Congress.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule a second is ordered, and the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri to 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill does two things: It makes a slight increase in the pay of the surgeons in the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service and gives them the same pay that is given to corresponding surgeons in the Army and the Navy, but does not give them the same allowance. While the pay is increased to correspond with the pay in the Army and Navy, the allowances are not increased. It also provides that the "Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service," a title which is very long for the service, shall hereafter be known as the "Public Health Service."

It also provides that the Public Health Service may study and investigate the diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof, including sanitation and sewage, and the pollution, either directly or indirectly, of the navigable streams and lakes of the United States, and that it may from time to time issue information in the form of publications for the use of the public.

There have been presented both in this House and in the other House of Congress various propositions in regard to the Public Health Service of the country. There have been bills introduced to create a department of health, a number of such bills. There have been various bills passed to create a bureau of health. Hearings have been had, both in the House and in the Senate on these subjects, and the present bill reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is for the purpose, if it should be enacted, of disposing, it is hoped, of the agitation in regard to increasing the activities of the Public Health Service, and providing not for a department of health, not for a bureau of health, but merely authorizing the present Public Health Service to make scientific investigation of disease and to publish that information very much along the same lines as are now followed by the Bureau of Animal Industry in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. To what extent does this law extend the authority the Public Health Service now has in the matter of making investigations relating to disease and the pollution of water and other things of that sort?

Mr. MANN. There is no department of the Government now authorized by law to make investigation of the pollution of the water or the streams of the country. The Public Health Service has now jurisdiction in the investigation of certain contagious or infections diseases which are named in the law, but they have no authority to investigate any other diseases except, possibly, in the public-health laboratory which they maintain.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want information with reference to the acts that created the Marine Hospital Service, that no doubt the gentleman can supply. I observe that these gentlemen are referred to as commissioned medical officers, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Was it contemplated in the original act that they should have military rank, title, and privileges?

Mr. MANN. Well, the Marine Hospital Service, I suppose, is one of the oldest services of the Government, originally for the purpose of taking care of the seamen of the merchant marine. Many acts have been passed and they now have titles. No additional titles are conferred here except the title of senior surgeon.

Mr. SLAYDEN. When were those titles given by law?

Mr. MANN. Many years ago.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Are you sure they were created by law?

Mr. MANN. This does not change the law in any respect whatever. They are appointed by the President, confirmed by the Senate, and have the titles that are named in the bill except that of senior surgeon.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does this add any new officer?

Mr. MANN. It adds no new officer.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I understand they have what is called in the Army "fogy increase."

Mr. MANN. They have that now.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. O'CONNELL. I have received a number of communications protesting against this bill, and one of the reasons for their objection to this bill is because they say this bill gives the officers a chance to invade the privacy of homes without any notice.

Mr. MANN. Let me say to the gentleman from Massachusetts and the other gentlemen of the House that there was decided opposition, and I think very properly so, to some of the bills which have been pending. Some of the provisions in the bill created a department of health, and there was decided opposition on the part of Christian Scientists and other people who did not believe in what is sometimes denominated the regular school of medicine, but after this bill was introduced—this bill—protests flooded the House with reference to the subject, and a hearing was given to those opposed to the bill, the League of Medical Freedom, various Christian Scientists, and I will say that they have none of the objections which they had in mind to the provisions of the bills which were introduced. There is nothing in this bill which will authorize a medical officer to invade the privacy of anyone's home.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman refer to this hearing where these associations were represented by Mr. Gordon, the former lieutenant governor of Ohio?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is what the gentleman refers to, and his bill is not objected to.

Mr. MANN. Oh, there is objection to the bill; they are afraid it may be extended. Now, let me say that the American Medical Association, or one of its officials, in some hearings which were had some years ago before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce made the statement that it was the desire on their part at the time that the Government shall control diseases; that they might take possession of diseased persons, and inspect homes, and so forth; and a large share of the scare that has grown up in reference to increasing the efficiency of the Public Health Service has grown out of that statement; and I am frank to say that no member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I think no Member of the House, would for a moment be in favor of any such law.

Mr. O'CONNELL and Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to ask the gentleman just how much does this bill extend the present power and jurisdiction of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service. Before the gentleman answers the question, I wish to call his attention to the fact that in the sundry civil bill provision is made for this service to take into one of its hospitals at any one time 10 persons suffering from contagious diseases. Will the gentleman explain if, under this bill, the present powers and jurisdiction of the service are extended?

Mr. MANN. The Public Health Service now has jurisdiction over certain specified contagious diseases.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What diseases?

Mr. MANN. I am not able to enumerate them to the gentleman, but smallpox, cholera, and a few things of that kind. They have also jurisdiction where there is an infectious or contagious disease that breaks out, like bubonic plague. They would have jurisdiction in connection with the officials of the State. They have now jurisdiction in their laboratory to investigate diseases also, and they have been investigating the disease of pellagra. There is a question as to whether they have really jurisdiction to make investigation of such diseases as pellagra, hookworm, and some new diseases which have come up. This gives them the authority to investigate those diseases and specifically includes the authority to investigate pollution of the water supply, which no branch of the Government now possesses.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] first.

Mr. BARNHART. I want to ask, Mr. Speaker, if this would give the Government authority over the State boards and city boards of health.

Mr. MANN. It would not.

Mr. BARNHART. There is no specific instruction here for it to do anything except to investigate and report?

Mr. MANN. That is all the power it has. I will say to the gentleman that there have been various bills pending that propose to have the Public Health Service given authority to call upon State boards, and so forth. There is nothing of the sort in this bill. We did not desire to include that.

Mr. DALZELL. The text of the bill on page 1, as I read it, does not do any more than to change the name of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

Mr. MANN. That is all it does on page 1.

Mr. DALZELL. And at the top of page 2 is all the additional power that is given by the bill?

Mr. MANN. That is absolutely true. The only additional power in the bill given to the Public Health Service is in lines from 1 to 7, inclusive, on page 2.

Mr. DALZELL. And section 2 relates entirely to increase of salaries?

Mr. MANN. Relates entirely to increase of salaries.

Mr. MADDEN. How much does this increase the salaries, and how much is the total increase in the cost of the service, and how many additions will it make?

Mr. MANN. Nobody can tell the total of the increase, because that is a matter of longevity pay. They now receive longevity pay. I will state to the gentleman what the increase is so far as individuals are concerned. The Surgeon General now receives $5,000. He has no longevity pay. This bill would give him $6,000. The senior surgeon now gets $4,060, and there are 10 senior surgeons. This would give them a possible $5,000. The surgeons now receive a possible $3,500. This would give them a possible $4,000. That would include the full 20 years' longevity pay. Passed assistant surgeons now receive $2,000. This would give them $2,400. The assistant surgeons now receive $1,600, and this would give them $2,000. The increase in pay is only necessary because the bright young surgeons of the country now will not desire to go into this service, because if they want to enter Government service they make for the Army and Navy, where they get this increased pay and also greater allowances than are provided for even by this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I just wanted to know whether this did not provide for the employment of a definite number of additional surgeons.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all. The last provision does not profess to cover surgeons at all.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, whatever help may be needed is authorized under this bill.

Mr. MANN. As may be provided for from time to time by Congress. But the number of surgeons is fixed by law.

Mr. MADDEN. Does it by appropriation or by law?

Mr. MANN. By appropriation, I suppose.

Mr. MADDEN. This law, then, does lay the foundation for the Appropriations Committee to recommend the pay for any additional number of men that may be required?

Mr. MANN. Only the ordinary force of the office; that is all.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would like to have the gentleman's information on this, because I always have implicit confidence in his judgment, as to whether or not the gentleman believes this is laying a foundation, either directly or indirectly, later on, on which to establish a department of health.

Mr. MANN. If I thought it was, I would not be for it.

Mr. President, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], and then I hope I may reserve my time for a moment, that if this bill passes I think it will end the agitation for a department or bureau of health. If this bill does not pass, or some similar bill does not pass in the future, it is likely that sometime, under the same kind of enthusiasm that caused two national conventions to declare in favor of a department of health, such a department might be created. Such a department is not needed, and it would be very much to the disadvantage of the Government to have a department of health, in my judgment.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I want to use my five minutes, not to tell what I know about this bill, but rather to suggest what I do not know about it. And it is what I do not know about this measure, its possible scope and result, that causes me to doubt the advisability of passing any such measure after 40 minutes' debate under suspension of the rules; yet I undertake to say that I know as much about this bill as the average Member sitting here present.

Now, the first knowledge I had of such a measure pending was when I received a telegram, such as perhaps all of the other Members of this body have received, protesting against the passage of this bill; and the first thing I did was to go to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee and show him this telegram and ask him what there was about this measure. I recollect very distinctly that he told me that it was a mere matter of a change of name in the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and that some power was to be given that service to prevent the pollution of interstate streams, and I think I can say truthfully that I have heard the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce make that same statement to other Members since that time.

I thereupon got a copy of this bill, and concluded at the very first glance that the change of name and the matter of investigating and preventing the pollution of interstate streams were very minor elements in the make-up of this bill, and I am of that opinion still. What is the scope of the authority of this new Public Health Service under this bill? Is it such as the gentleman from Illinois said, with reference to a former measure pending in this House?—

> I do not know to what scope the bill may reach. I do not know from a reading of the bill just how far it is intended to change the law with reference to the quarantine regulations or health regulations.

I defy any Member of this House to read this bill through and tell what is intended by it unless it is to place under the control of the health department the subject of all the health regulations in the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I am reading now from the hearings before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Of what date?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. On Thursday, January 19, 1911.

Mr. HINSHAW. Was that in reference to this very bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No; not in reference to this particular bill, but in reference, as I understand it, to a very similar bill that was introduced in the House in a former Congress. But, leaving that out of consideration, the gentleman from Illinois said a few moments ago that he doubted whether under the existing law the Marine-Hospital Service had the right to investigate certain diseases. I believe he named the hookworm and one or two other diseases. He said he doubted whether under the existing law the Marine-Hospital Service had the right to investigate those diseases, and that the authority or jurisdiction of the Marine-Hospital Service is now confined to certain contagious diseases such as smallpox, the bubonic plague, and so forth.

But I do not suppose the gentleman will say there is any doubt whatever about the jurisdiction and authority of the Public Health Service, if this bill becomes a law, to investigate not only these contagious diseases and such diseases as the hookworm, but every disease to which human flesh is heir; and there is no boundary, no limit that I can see, fixed in the bill as to where and under what conditions and as to when and how these investigations are to be carried on.

I noticed the statement in this bill that the existing rules and regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service are made the rules and regulations under the law, as it will be under this bill, and I wrote to the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service for a copy of their rules and regulations, and I have them here in my hand. You can see the bulk of them, but you do not know what is in them. But I found this one thing in them, that their authority and jurisdiction heretofore seems to be confined to quarantine and quarantinable diseases. Everything in these regulations practically refers to quarantine matters; and, as the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce said awhile ago, their present operations are confined to the laboratory here, but if this bill is enacted their operations will be confined by the boundaries of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes more of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] yields two minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It would be enlightening if some gentleman who understands this business better than I do could take this bill and these regulations and go through them and determine just what would be the power and jurisdiction of this new Public Health Service.

Now, I find this regulation:

> It shall be the duty of the director of the laboratory to recommend to the Surgeon General, from time to time, special researches in the prevention, causation, and cure of disease, matters relating to the public health, and collateral subjects pertaining thereto.

As I say, this authority now seems to be very limited. It is limited to the laboratories down here; it is limited to quarantine stations to prevent the coming in of immigrants with certain contagious diseases—only about seven in all. But this bill authorizes the investigation of all diseases of man, and who will say, in the light of these rules and regulations, that it will not embrace as well the indorsement and recommendation of methods of treatment and the remedies, thereby giving standing and authenticity to certain schools of medicine?

I turn over on the next page, and I find the Chief of the Division of Chemistry shall have certain powers, and the Chief of the Division of Pathology and Bacteriology shall have certain powers, and I find that the Chief of the Division of Pharmacology, going into the matter of medicine, shall have certain powers and shall conduct investigations and analyses in relation to disease, thereby, it seems to me, endangering the creation of a bureau which may conduct investigations and make reports along the line of certain schools of medicine without any limitation being put into the bill as to the scope of its work.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, like several other gentlemen of this House, I have received in the last month many protests against the passage of this bill. Personally I do not know very much about it, but I am very much afraid that this bill will do a great deal more than many Members of this House think and believe it will. It may be, and possibly is, true that in the case of a great calamity the Government should take charge of infectious diseases like cholera and diseases of that sort. But this bill goes far beyond anything that the Government has ever undertaken to do heretofore.

I want to call the attention of Members of the House to a paragraph on page 2, which gives authority to the United States to enter the States and examine into the conditions in regard to the propagation and spread of disease, examine sanitation, sewage, and so forth. It strikes me that that is a matter which ought to be left exclusively to the States. I take it that every State in the Union has a State board of health that ought to be competent to examine into these matters.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. How about agriculture? Do you think the States ought to take care of all the agricultural interests of the State?

Mr. COX of Indiana. That is different. I am unalterably opposed to letting anything go through to lay a foundation for a great department of health, to any proposition that will later on be multiplied and enlarged upon and made the foundation of a great department of health. That I am absolutely opposed to.

It is getting customary for the people to come to the Government of the United States to get the Government to do everything. If it does not stop soon I do not know where we are going to land. It strikes me that the people to-day are growing more and more helpless back in our country and territory. They are getting in the habit of coming to Congress to get the Government to do something for them that they can and ought to do for themselves, and I believe that we are laying the foundation here for the Government to do the very thing which the State ought to do for itself.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman send to the farmers in his district the book on the Diseases of Cattle and Horses?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do; but I do not propose to allow the Government to send its physicians out there to practice medicine in my district in opposition to the physicians in my district.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Have the veterinarians or the farmers ever complained about it?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Well, they are not very wild over it or much informed about it, and I doubt if this expense has ever paid for itself.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, this is a pretty safe bill to vote against in any case. If it accomplishes no more than the chairman of the committee explained in his opening statement, then it is scarcely worth voting for. If it accomplishes no more than that, it would hardly find a place on the floor of the House. Pretty nearly everything in it relating to the power of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service is already embraced in their power, and they are to-day doing it.

For the purpose of giving the House as much information as I or any Member possesses as to the functions of that bureau, I am going to send to the desk and have read from the Congressional Directory a description of the functions of the Bureau of Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC HEALTH AND MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The act approved July 1, 1902, "An act to increase the efficiency and change the name of the United States Marine-Hospital Service," provides for a Bureau of Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service at Washington, comprised of seven divisions. The operations of these divisions are coordinated and are under the immediate supervision of the Surgeon General.

Through the Division of Scientific Research and Sanitation are conducted the scientific investigations of the service and the operations of the Hygienic Laboratory at Washington, established for the investigation of contagious and infectious diseases and matters relating to the public health. The advisory board of the Hygienic Laboratory consists of eight scientists eminent in laboratory work in its relation to public health, detailed from other departments of the Government and appointed from endowed institutions. The board may be called into conference with the Surgeon General at any time, the meetings not to exceed 10 days in any one fiscal year. The Surgeon General is required by law to call a conference of all State and Territorial boards of health or quarantine authorities each year, the District of Columbia included, and special conferences when called for by not less than five of said authorities, and he is also authorized to call additional conferences when, in his opinion, the interests of public health demand it. He is charged with the enforcement of the act of July 1, 1902, "An act to regulate the sale of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products in the District of Columbia, to regulate interstate traffic in said articles, and for other purposes." He has supervision of special investigations upon leprosy, conducted in Hawaii under the act of July 1, 1905.

Through the Division of Foreign and Insular Quarantine and Immigration the Surgeon General enforces the national quarantine laws and prepares the regulations relating thereto. He has control of 44 Federal quarantine stations in the United States and others in the Philippines, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, and supervises the medical officers detailed in the offices of the American consular officers at foreign ports to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States. Under section 17 of the act approved February 20, 1907, he has supervision over the medical officers engaged in the physical and mental examinations of all arriving aliens.

Through the Division of Domestic (Interstate) Quarantine is enforced section 3 of the act of February 15, 1893, relating to the prevention of the spread of contagious or infectious diseases from one State or Territory into another. This includes the suppression of epidemics.

Through the Division of Sanitary Reports and Statistics there is collected information of the sanitary condition of foreign ports and places and ports and places within the United States, including the existence of epidemics. This information, with morbidity and mortality statistics, domestic and foreign, are published in the weekly Public Health Reports and transmitted to State and municipal health officers and other sanitarians and to collectors of customs.

Through the Division of Marine Hospitals and Relief professional care is taken of sick and disabled seamen at 23 marine hospitals and 123 other relief stations. The beneficiaries include officers and crews of registered, enrolled, or licensed vessels of the United States and of the Revenue-Cutter Service and Lighthouse Service; seamen employed on vessels of the Mississippi River Commission and of the Engineer Corps of the Army; keepers and surfmen of the Life-Saving Service. A purveying depot for the purchase and issuance of supplies is maintained at Washington. Physical examinations of keepers and surfmen of the Life-Saving Service, of officers and seamen of the Revenue-Cutter Service, and the examinations for the detection of colorblindness in masters, mates, and pilots are conducted through this division.

In the Division of Personnel and Accounts are kept the records of the officers and of the expenditures of the appropriations.

Through the Miscellaneous Division the various service publications are issued, including the annual reports, public-health reports and reprints, public-health bulletins, bulletins of the Hygienic Laboratory and Yellow Fever Institute, and the transactions of the annual conferences with State health authorities. The medical evidences of disability in claims for benefits against the Life-Saving Service are reviewed.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, the House can see from that brief statement about what the functions of this hospital and health service are. It is proposed now to grant an increase of salary all down the line to perform some additional duties. If this bill does not impose any additional duties beyond what were explained, there will be no justification for this bill or for the increase of salaries. If the additional duties are embraced anywhere in this bill, they are at the top of page 2:

The Public Health Service may study and investigate the diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof.

I believe in the old-fashioned school of medicine. While I sympathize with all others who believe in other lines of medicine and who believe in different schools for the cure of human ills, I believe they ought to have all of the liberty that is safe and consistent in this country. But here we will clothe this board with more than its proper Federal functions. It is now proposed to clothe it with part of the police powers of the State, or what will conflict directly with the police powers of the State, by giving them the right to investigate all of the conditions out of which all of the diseases of all of mankind may possibly arise. If that is not a broad power, I never heard of one. I can not conceive of a bill being drawn any broader than that.

To say that this board may study the diseases of man and the conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof is a very broad power to grant. There is absolutely nothing under that kind of power that this board could not perform, whether it be of a local or national character. Evidently that is what has given rise to the opposition and fear of this bill. Evidently that kind of function is beyond the jurisdiction and power of the Federal board. They now have the power of calling a conference of all of the State officials in regard to contagious diseases and propagating all of the information that the State officials themselves are able to gather, either through the local aid of State officials or through their laboratories here in Washington. They have all of the information in regard to human ills that the Agricultural Department can furnish us in regard to those of animals. The Agricultural Department when it undertakes to cure hogs—and they put this on the same level with the curing of hogs—does not undertake to send out the serum and put it into the hogs. It did that once or twice, but now it sends the inquirer to the State universities.

It is trying to do those things through the State authorities, and this board could do its work through the State authorities by calling a conference, as the law provides, and having its laboratories here in the city of Washington and then sending out the information. It should act in cooperation with the State authorities. There is no need for this law and no demand for it on the part of the public and no need for this increase of salaries.

I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL].

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I have received a letter from a very distinguished constituent of mine, President Eliot, of Harvard University, referring to the bill H. R. 30292. He says:

I am sure it is not desirable or wise that the national Public Health Service should be placed in the hands of the Surgeon General and his subordinates. The bill H. R. 30292 gives a very wide scope to the activities of the proposed public health service in lines 12 and 13 of page 1 and 1 to 5 of page 11. Over any bureau or department with such functions a civilian scientist ought certainly to preside. Lines 23 to 25 on page 11 would give the Surgeon General control over the entire National Health Service——

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion right there?

Mr. McCALL. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. That letter evidently refers to a different bill than this, because there is no such page as page 11.

Mr. McCALL. It refers to the bill H. R. 30292.

Mr. NYE. That is this bill.

Mr. McCALL. I misread that. That is page 2. At any rate, I will read the letter. He continues:

Lines 23 to 25, on page 2, would give the Surgeon General control over the entire national health service, if Congress should make the necessary appropriation; but all the medical officers employed under that clause would be subordinates of the Surgeon General. We have never had a Surgeon General who was fit to exercise such a comprehensive control, and it is in the highest degree improbable that we ever shall have, since the training and functions of a Surgeon General do not prepare him for that kind of scientific work.

The bill makes an unwise proposal in an insidious way. It ought not to get any standing at all before Congress.

Then he goes on to refer to a certain league, which he says is a combination of all the quacks, and so forth—against every public control of medical and surgical practitioners and of pharmacists. They also, as a rule, oppose medical research, vaccination, and the use of antitoxins of all sorts. They are opposed to the use of the collective forces of the community to protect people from the results of ignorance, superstition, and deceit. Unfortunately, diseases, like ignorance and superstition, can not be successfully resisted on the principle of respecting each individual's right to suffer, be sick, and die. Possibly there is such a right, but it can not be exercised without grave danger to many other individuals. Contagious diseases take effect on masses of people, and they can only be successfully resisted by collective action.

[Applause.]

That is signed Charles W. Eliot.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman from Missouri exhausted his time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has exhausted his time.

Mr. MANN. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER]. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am as broad, I think, and liberal in medicine as any man who ever practiced that profession. [Applause.] I would not for one minute stand upon this floor and advocate a bill that I thought was going to give to any particular school any right over any other school of medicine, but I want to say that in my judgment this bill only enlarges the power of the Public Health Service to investigate disease, to find out what causes it, and the prevention of that disease. Members to-day appear to be very much scared because they think that this health bill might go into the State and investigate some of the conditions concerning the causes of disease, and yet I have to hear the first one get upon this floor and protest against the Government spending thousands of dollars to investigate the disease of hog cholera throughout the country, of gapes in chickens, of diseases of the horse and cow, and all those troubles that concern the States. This bill is not an invasion of State rights, nor an interference of the rights of any State. Not a word has been uttered against all this. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill passes it gives these men the right to investigate the diseases of man and the conditions surrounding the same and will put the Public Health Service upon a footing that it ought to stand upon; that is that it may have the power to go out and investigate the cause of diseases, try to prevent them, and then issue popular bulletins that go to the people that they may read them and become familiar with those causes, and how best to prevent disease affecting man. I hope, Mr. Speaker, nobody in this House to-day will feel that this is an abridgement of the right of any man to practice medicine or to select any particular school of practice that he may desire.

This bill also gives the Public Health Bureau the right to investigate the pollution of streams as affected by sewage and other causes of pollution. No man who has studied the question of water will deny that this is a most important question and one that needs careful study. A nation can not be a prosperous and happy nation without its people are healthy and strong. The cost to the people in sickness amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars each year.

The people of the South recognize of what value the discovery of the cause of yellow fever has been to that section of our country. That disease does not have its terrors since the cause has been ascertained and the means of prevention found.

There are to-day many diseases which affect man that the cause and prevention is not understood, and we hope that with a proper investigation much may be learned and thereby human lives may be saved.

This bill deals with the question of the cause and prevention of disease and not any particular kind of practice. As a physician I feel that we ought to give more attention to the investigation of this great question, and it is to be hoped that if this bill becomes a law it may be the means of saving human life. I hope the bill will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there is not a line in the bill, not a word in the bill that in any way will affect the rights of the States or the rights of local communities or the rights of individuals to be protected under the law in every right which they have. There is not a line or a word in the bill that confers upon the General Government or upon this department the authority to interfere with the States or municipalities, or with individuals. What does this bill do in the main? The main provision in the bill is the authority to study the pollution of the water supply of the country, the pollution of the navigable streams and the lakes of the country. If we keep on as we are going now in a few years in this country it will be impossible to drink water any more, and we will be driven to the position to which they have been driven abroad of drinking wine in place of water. [Applause.] I want to see the water supply studied; I want to see a study and investigation of the subject in such a way that we will be protected in the use of water, and this bill will give authority to make a study. This bill authorizes the study and investigation of diseases and the publication of the results of such investigation. It authorizes a scientific study of the diseases of man as we now make a study of the diseases of hogs and chickens, and I think it is just as much worth while for us to know about the diseases to which we are subject as it is to know about the diseases to which hogs are subject, to which our horses are subject, to which our cows are subject. The other day we passed legislation to authorize 100,000 more copies of the horse book——

A MEMBER. And the cattle book.

Mr. MANN. And 100,000 more copies of the cow book. I want to see the time when we can furnish information to the people as to the diseases to which they are subject. [Applause.] I believe by a proper study of the subject that we can eradicate many of the diseases to which the human flesh is now heir. It only takes scientific investigation and a publication of that investigation to eradicate many of those diseases. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 125, noes 51.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask for tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Tellers were refused, 34 Members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Thirty-two Members, not a sufficient number.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the other side.

The negative vote was taken on the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. On this vote there are 32 yeas and 144 nays. The yeas and nays are refused.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS ON FORTIFICATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members may print remarks on the fortification amendment for four days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] has asked unanimous consent to print remarks on the fortification amendment to the sundry civil bill.

The SPEAKER. Yes; for four days.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have been requested by a number of Members to make that request in their behalf generally, but, of course, will not do so now.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 32957) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1911, and for prior years, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and, with the accompanying report (No. 2268), ordered to be printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

BONDING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. TAWNEY, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted a report (No. 2267) of the joint commission of Congress to inquire into the rate of premium heretofore and now being charged, as well as those proposed to be charged, by surety or bonding companies for bonds of officers or employees of the United States, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

GOLD BULLION AND FOREIGN GOLD COIN.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 10457 and pass the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table the following Senate bill and pass the same, which bill the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 10457) to amend section 6 of the currency act of March 14, 1900, as amended by the act approved March 4, 1907.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of an act to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes, approved March 14, 1900, as amended by the act approved March 4, 1907, be, and the same is hereby, further amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to receive deposits of gold coin with the Treasurer, or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums of not less than $20, and to issue gold certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $10, and the coin so deposited shall be retained in the Treasury and held for the payment of such certificates on demand, and used for no other purpose. Such certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued, and when held by any national banking association may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve: Provided, That whenever and so long as the gold coin and bullion held in the reserve fund in the Treasury for the redemption of United States notes and Treasury notes shall fall and remain below $100,000,000 the authority to issue certificates as herein provided shall be suspended: And provided further, That whenever and so long as the aggregate amount of United States notes and silver certificates in the general fund of the Treasury shall exceed $60,000,000 the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, suspend the issue of the certificates herein provided for: And provided further, That of the amount of such outstanding certificates one-fourth at least shall be in denominations of $50 or less: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, issue such certificates in denominations of $10,000, payable to order: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, receive, with the assistant treasurer in New York and the assistant treasurer in San Francisco, deposits of foreign gold coin at their bullion value in amounts of not less than $1,000 in value and issue gold certificates therefor of the description herein authorized: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, receive, with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, deposits of gold bullion bearing the stamp of the coinage mints of the United States, or the assay office in New York, certifying their weight, fineness, and value, in amounts of not less than $1,000 in value, and issue gold certificates therefor of the description herein authorized. But the amount of gold bullion and foreign coin so held shall not at any time exceed one-third of the total amount of gold certificates at such time outstanding. And section 5193 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not opposed to this bill, Mr. Speaker, but in order that the House may understand what the bill is, unless someone who is opposed to it desires a second, I will demand a second myself.

The SPEAKER. A second is ordered under the rule. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this bill is identical with House bill 31857, to amend section 6 of the currency act of March 14, 1900, as amended by the act approved March 4, 1907, which bill was reported unanimously from the Committee on Ways and Means. It simply allows the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates for the value of the gold bullion and gold coin that has been deposited in the Treasury of the United States or in the subtreasuries at New York and San Francisco, I believe.

One object of the bill is to get rid of the expense of recoinage. Under the present practice a large amount of foreign coin is brought into the United States and recoined here and then sent abroad and recoined there, and this would save the expense of our recoinage. It amends the section of the act which provides for the coinage of gold into coin and the issuance of certificates against that; but the chief object of this bill is to save the coinage of the gold bullion and the gold bars that are deposited in the Treasury and issuing certificates therefor similar to those issued for gold coin.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the bill provides what these certificates shall be called. Will they be a new form of certificate?

Mr. PAYNE. It does not give any particular name to them. It simply authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates for the gold bullion deposited. Of course, they would be similar.

Mr. NORRIS. Are they the same as the present gold certificates?

Mr. PAYNE. They would pass as currency the same as the present gold certificates, and would be of the same value as the bullion represented by these certificates, just as the present certificates certify that gold coin has been deposited in the Treasury to such and such a value.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the law provide that they shall be a legal tender?

Mr. PAYNE. There is no express provision to that effect.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no express provision to that effect in this act, but there is provision in the general law.

Mr. NORRIS. Would that apply to these certificates?

Mr. PAYNE. This law becomes a part of the act of 1900 and to the amendment of that act in 1907, which requires that all of these certificates shall be redeemed in gold coin.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is another provision of law, carried on the sundry civil appropriation bill, which authorizes the printing of the certificates and requires them all to be of the same size—uniform in size.

Mr. NORRIS. On the presentation of these certificates the Government would have to pay them, not in gold coin, but in bullion?

Mr. PAYNE. In gold coin.

Mr. NORRIS. They would deposit gold bullion, and the men who had them redeemed would get gold coin?

Mr. PAYNE. They are redeemable in gold coin.

Mr. NORRIS. That would obviate the necessity of the coinage of the gold?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; and it would save the expense of it.

Mr. NORRIS. There might come a time when they would have to coin this bullion in order to have enough gold with which to redeem these certificates.

Mr. PAYNE. That is provided for.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will ask the gentleman, Would this effect a saving to the Government?

Mr. PAYNE. In answer to that I would say that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter, under date of December 10, 1910, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, said that—

> During the last 20 years there has been imported into this country $379,000,000 in foreign gold coin, and of this amount $311,000,000 was deposited at the mints for recoinage. In the meantime, $829,000,000 of the United States gold coin has been exported. The $311,000,000 of foreign gold coin was recoined at our mints at the expense of our Government, while more than double that amount of our own money was exported during the same period. The coinage of $311,000,000 of foreign gold coin into American coin must have cost at least $800,000, or $40,000 per year.
>
> We have now some $940,000,000 in gold coin stored away in the various subtreasuries and mints, the greater part of which is a reserve against gold certificates that in all likelihood will never be presented for redemption in coin. In the majority of cases where gold certificates are presented in large quantities for redemption it is for the purpose of securing gold bars, yet we continue to coin each year nearly $100,000,000 in gold, at an annual cost of somewhere between $200,000 and $300,000. If gold certificates might be issued against this gold bullion, the major part of this cost would be saved without in any way impairing the redeemability of the certificates, and at the same time bankers and exchange dealers could be in a position to secure bars, which they prefer for purposes of export, with greater promptness and less expense. In view of the fact that America produces nearly $100,000,000 in gold per year, and that the inevitable drift of gold must be from America, it is peculiarly reasonable that a considerable part of the gold which we produce should not be transformed at once into coin.
>
> The plan contemplated in the following-suggested bill offers abundant safeguards against the excessive reduction of the deposits of United States coin gold held against the certificates in requiring that the amount of gold bullion so held shall not at any time exceed one-third of the total amount of gold certificates at such time outstanding and in providing that the receipt of gold bullion and foreign gold coin shall always remain at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I can not see any possible objection upon the part of any gentleman to the bill.

Mr. BENNET of New York. As I understand, it saves $200,000 or $300,000 a year to the Government.

Mr. PAYNE. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I notice that this bill does not provide that these certificates shall be legal tender. It provides that such certificates shall be receivable for taxes and customs, and so forth.

Mr. PAYNE. This is an amendment to section 6. The other sections do provide that the certificates under the act are legal tender.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I wanted to get the information, because I wanted to know what the effect would be not only upon these certificates, but upon other certificates, if these were not made legal tender.

Mr. PAYNE. They have the same legal status that the other certificates have. By the other sections of the bill all the certificates issued are put in the same class and have the same provision in regard to redeemability.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

WHITE PHOSPHORUS MATCHES.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 290, authorizing the President to appoint a competent person to investigate the manufacture of white phosphorus matches and report to the next session of Congress.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

> Whereas the President in his message of December, 1910, called the attention of Congress to the diseases incident to the manufacture of white phosphorus matches, and the very serious injury caused to many persons employed therein, and recommended remedial and corrective legislation therefor; and
>
> Whereas the legislation proposed looks to the prohibition of the manufacture of white phosphorus matches from and after July 1, 1912, and the sale of such product from and after July 1, 1914: Therefore
>
> Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby authorized and requested to designate and employ a competent person to visit the match factories of the United States, examine the conditions under which the business is carried on, and report to Congress in December, 1911, as follows:
>
> First. Present conditions of manufacture as affecting the health of the employees.
>
> Second. What, if any, substitutes for white phosphorus can be found by which the dangers can be minimized in the manufacture, distribution, and use of matches.
>
> Third. Whether these substitutes are free from patent control and secret formulas for manufacture and open and unrestricted to general use, and not of excessive cost as compared with the matches now produced.
>
> Fourth. Complete and detailed information as to the commercial conditions under which this industry is carried on, whether controlled by any combination or trust, and whether the sale of the product is in any way now restricted or regulated by the producers, beyond the point of free and reasonable competition in trade, and whether the proposed prohibition of the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches would tend toward a monopoly of what has become a necessity of life.
>
> SEC. 2. That the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of this inquiry and investigation.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not know that I am opposed to the bill, but I would like some explanation of it.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule a second is ordered.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that this does not propose any legislation at the present time. It is a joint resolution in lieu of the bill popularly known as the "Esch phosphorus bill." That bill would not go into effect as to a part of its provisions until the 1st of July, 1912, and as to the remaining provisions until July, 1914. The committee did not consider that it has now sufficient information to pass on the questions involved in the bill, and simply reported in lieu of the bill this resolution, which authorizes and directs the President to make an investigation and report at the next session of Congress.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman think that the investigation can be made and the report had at the next session?

Mr. DALZELL. I think so.

Mr. PARSONS. Why is there an investigation needed? Has not the Bureau of Labor investigated the subject?

Mr. DALZELL. It has to a certain extent, but not so thoroughly as the committee thinks it ought.

Mr. PARSONS. In what respect?

Mr. DALZELL. Well, because notwithstanding the question of investigation made by the bureau, there is some question as to whether the passage of the bill in its present shape would not create a monopoly in the manufacture of matches. It is a long story, but I will recite it if gentlemen wish.

The Esch phosphorus bill, in lieu of which this resolution is reported, proposes to tax out of existence the manufacture of matches with white phosphorus. After the first hearing by the committee it appeared that to pass the bill as introduced would be to create a monopoly in the Diamond Match Co., manufacturers of matches in this country. While this was true, there came a pressure from some source or other, so that the Diamond Match Co. was induced in the first place to offer an agreement to the so-called independent match manufacturers that upon payment of a certain amount of money and the performance of certain things the Diamond Match Co. would grant them the use of the French patent under which that company manufactured; still the agreement appeared to the committee to be so unfair that it was not willing to accept it is a justification to the committee in recommending the passage of the bill. Subsequently the Diamond Match Co. surrendered its patent.

But there still remained in the committee a serious doubt as to whether the safe material out of which the Diamond Match Co. makes its matches can be procured in sufficient quantities by outside companies to carry on their business. Furthermore, questions arose as to patented machinery and patented processes, and all that sort of thing, and the committee is not prepared to say now that to report the bill in the shape in which it came to it would not be to establish a monopoly in the manufacture of matches in this country.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does this danger of a monopoly arise out of something connected with patents?

Mr. DALZELL. Out of the fact that the Diamond Match Co. owned a French patent for manufacturing sesquisulphide, which is the only known to be safe material out of which to manufacture safety matches.

Mr. HINSHAW. I understood the gentleman to say that they had canceled the patent.

Mr. DALZELL. They canceled the patent, but there is a question whether or not a sufficient quantity of sesquisulphide, which is controlled by the Diamond Match Co., can be furnished to the independent matchmakers.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I suggest also to my colleague that it is a serious question, as shown by the hearings, whether the passage of the bill in its original form would in fact stop the manufacture of white sulphur matches.

Mr. DALZELL. That is true.

Mr. CALDER. It would not.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Is there any bureau in the Government capable of making this investigation?

Mr. DALZELL. I think there are several.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman thinks they would have time to do it between now and the convening of Congress?

Mr. DALZELL. I think all of the investigation that is necessary could be made between now and the convening of Congress, certainly in time to legislate at the next Congress.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman express any opinion on this proposition, as to whether or not there is a trust existing in the manufacture of matches?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, I think there would be if the bill as introduced were passed.

Mr. PARSONS. Will this investigation be confined to matters here, or will they investigate matters abroad also?

Mr. DALZELL. I will read to the gentleman what is proposed to be investigated:

SECTION 1. The President is hereby authorized and requested to designate and employ a competent person to visit the match factories of the United States, examining the conditions under which the business is carried on, and report to Congress in December, 1911, as follows:

First. Present conditions of manufacture as affecting the health of the employees.

Second. What, if any, substitutes for white phosphorus can be found by which the dangers can be minimized in the manufacture, distribution, and use of matches.

Third. Whether these substitutes are free from patent control and secret formulas for manufacturing and open and unrestricted to general use, and not of excessive cost as compared with the matches now produced.

Fourth. Complete and detailed information as to the commercial conditions under which this industry is carried on, whether controlled by any combination or trust, and whether the sale of the product is in any way now restricted or regulated by the producers, beyond the point of free and reasonable competition in trade, and whether the proposed prohibition of the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches would tend toward a monopoly of what has become a necessity of life.

SEC. 2. The sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated for the purposes of this inquiry and investigation.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, if my colleague will permit me a moment, I think that I can answer the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS]. If it is in order, or if I can get unanimous consent if not in order, I would like to offer an amendment to page 2, line 15, to insert after the word "conditions" the words "and cost in this and foreign countries," so that the investigation would include not only looking into the matter of whether this business is controlled by a trust in our own country, but the extent to which it is also controlled in foreign countries.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he does not believe the Tariff Board could investigate this condition.

Mr. GAINES. The Tariff Board might, in the course of time, reach that; but it was supposed that this matter sounded in the public health and that there ought to be some quicker action. I think that is the answer.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, while I do not see any objection to the amendment of my colleague, still, at the same time, it seems to me that $5,000 would not cover an investigation of that character.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I would have to object to that.

Mr. JAMES. They already have that right under the bill.

Mr. PARSONS. But the first part of the bill does refer to visiting factories in the United States, and it might be construed to be limited to the United States.

Mr. JAMES. But the language directing the investigation of the trust or monopoly does not confine it to the United States. The language of the bill is "whether controlled by any combination or trust." It does not say in the United States at all.

Mr. PARSONS. That might be so, and unless they can investigate conditions abroad then we will not learn what they have been able to do in foreign countries where they have rid themselves of these white phosphorus matches.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], the author of the bill.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is not what I had hoped as the result of the introduction of the bill last June seeking to prevent the use of white or yellow phosphorus in the manufacture of matches. A hearing was had before the Committee on Ways and Means and men expert in the matter presented their views, and disclosed a state of facts which would render it inadvisable to much longer defend legislation seeking to prevent the use of a poison in the making of matches. However, as this resolution is the utmost which the Committee on Ways and Means are willing to report at this time, I am content to support it. We sought by several means to prevent the use of the white or yellow phosphorus. We thought at one time it might be done by the exercise of the power given under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, but we found that that would not be a sufficient preventive, because factories could establish themselves in the several States, confine their operations to those States, and thus continue the use of this poison. Therefore we thought we would use the taxing power of the Constitution to prevent the use of this poison. The bill introduced by me is based upon that proposition. Now, this resolution directs that a special investigation be made as to the extent of the use of white or yellow phosphorus and of possible innoxious substitutes, as to patents that are now used and as to questions of monopoly, if any such monopoly exist, in the matchmaking industry. The information thus obtained doubtless will be of value, yet there is in a Government publication already an exhaustive report as to the use of white and yellow phosphorus in the match factories of this country. The January, 1910, number of the Bulletin of the Bureau of Labor gives the location of every factory and gives numerous instances of the disease known as necrosis.

The showing is of such a character as to make every man in this House favor some legislation that will prevent this terrible occupational disease. We sought it in the bill that we have introduced, but if that bill is imperfect in form or in the character of the penalties prescribed, we are willing to submit to any amendment that may be offered to perfect it. Possibly this resolution will disclose some additional evidence to enlighten the committee and the Members of Congress as to the character of the legislation we should enact. Let the purpose of Congress be to destroy this occupational disease. This plan of legislation is to my mind the only effective form to reach that desirable end. A large percentage of the matches now made in this country are made of white and yellow phosphorus, made by the Diamond Match Factory, a so-called trust, and this trust owns the French patent for the use of the sesquisulphide of phosphorus, an innocuous substitute. It has voluntarily canceled its patent, leaving the sesquisulphide available to any manufacturer who wants to use it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. When did they do that?

Mr. ESCH. They did that within one month, as the result of the agitation following the introduction of the bill.

Mr. COX of Indiana. That was the very question I was about to ask the gentleman.

Mr. ESCH. So that if no legislation follows now, the agitation will have had that effect. There are other innoxious elements that can be used as well as sesquisulphide, and are now being used in some continental countries. I want to say every considerable country, England and most every other country of Europe, is prohibiting the use of white or yellow phosphorus, while America, claiming a superior civilization, permits the use of this poison in the manufacture of matches.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman permit a question? Does the gentleman think that the Congress would get the information it needs if this investigation is confined to the United States? Ought it not to be an investigation of the conditions in other countries also?

Mr. ESCH. I think the investigation in the United States will disclose sufficient information for Congress to act upon. The idea is to get that information as speedily as possible. England is using the French patent, the sesquisulphide, and continental Europe is using the red or scarlet phosphorus, which is innoxious. I believe the thing to do is to get the information and to act thereon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman give any information in regard to the fire losses or loss of life by the use of these matches?

Mr. ESCH. It is extremely large, and it is one of the things that might largely be avoided by the use of these substitutes.

Mr. YOUNG of New York. I want to ask the gentleman a question with regard to Japan, where matches are made very largely.

Mr. ESCH. I have no information with regard to that. One of the most encouraging signs of the present day is the increasing interest now being taken in protecting the health and well-being of our laboring classes. Not only is this true with reference to State legislatures, but it is also true with reference to Congress. The safety-appliance acts and the locomotive-boiler inspection bill just passed, together with provisions securing greater safety to railway mail clerks by requiring the use on the part of common carriers of steel mail cars, indicate that Congress is directing its attention along humanitarian lines, and is doing what it can, under constitutional limitations, to safeguard the lives of employees of the Government as well as of the common carriers, and incidentally of the general public.

The establishment of labor bureaus and the enactment of laws placing upon employers the liability for injuries received in line of duty by their employees; the regulation of the hours of labor; the prevention of child labor; and the amelioration of the working conditions of women on the part of State legislatures attest this new spirit in matters of legislation.

This movement has only started. It is far from being consummated, but we should feel encouraged at the progress already made. Both State and Nation have for years been legislating to prevent injuries to our fruits and grains and for the protection of our food animals, and the result of such legislation has saved millions of dollars to our people and added largely to the quality and amount of our agricultural products. No one will or can raise an objection to this class of legislation, but it seems inconsistent that for so many years so much attention should be given to the protection of our crops and domestic animals, while protection to the human animal has been wholly ignored.

The study of occupational diseases in the United States has been sadly neglected. Our industrial European rivals have far outstripped us in this particular and have enacted stringent laws, both protective and regulatory, in order to wholly abolish or to minimize such diseases. Only a few States have sought to protect human life against occupational diseases. With increase of our population and of our manufacturing interests the need of such legislation is ever increasing. We are beginning to realize that it is not economy to permit any industry to injure the health or take the life of a workman, and thereby possibly impose upon the public the care and keep of himself or of his family.

The new thought now engaging the minds of progressive men and women everywhere is to place the burden of the death or injury or loss of health of the workman, not upon his shoulders, or, in the case of his death, upon those of his widow or orphaned children, but upon the industry itself, thereby distributing it upon the public at large.

In the carrying out of this thought there was organized in this country five or six years ago the American branch of the International Association for Labor Legislation. This branch has already taken an active interest in promoting legislation aiming to improve the condition of the American workmen and has given much attention to the investigation of occupational diseases.

In the fall of 1908 Dr. John B. Andrews, secretary of the American Association for Labor Legislation, entered upon the study and investigation of "phosphorus necrosis," commonly known as "phossy jaw," an occupational disease connected with the manufacture of matches with white and yellow phosphorus. Shortly after he had started his investigations the Commissioner of Labor, Hon. Charles P. Neill, started a like investigation, and Dr. Andrews was invited to cooperate. The result of their joint labors was published in the January (1910) number of the Bulletin of the Bureau of Labor. The report is exhaustive, practically every match factory in the United States having been investigated personally, either by Dr. Andrews or some official of the Bureau of Labor.

It was found that there were 16 match factories in the United States in 1909, employing 3,591 persons, of which 2,024 were males and 1,253 females 16 years of age or over. The number of children under 16 years of age employed was 314.

Sixteen definite cases of phosphorus poisoning were discovered, and talks with factory managers disclosed the fact that many other cases had occurred. An investigation made by Dr. Andrews in the homes of the work people of 3 of the factories disclosed a total of 82 cases. In 2 factories 8 perfectly authenticated serious cases were found to have occurred during 1909, and references were found to 3 more. Moreover, he discovered records of more than 100 cases within a very short time, notwithstanding the claims made by some of the match manufacturers that this disease had not existed in a serious form for 20 years in this country.

Dr. Andrews further reports as follows:

> In one small factory records were secured of more than 20 serious cases during the past 30 years, many of them requiring the removal of an entire jaw. This factory has been under its present ownership since 1892. In one of the most modern establishments, owned by the same company since 1880, records of 40 cases of phosphorus poisoning were secured. Of this number 15 resulted in permanent deformity through the loss of one or both jaws, and several cases resulted in death. * * * In another factory the records of 21 cases were secured, 6 of which were in the year 1909.

The detailed investigation in 15 out of the 16 factories doing business in the United States showed that 65 per cent of the employees were working under conditions which subjected them to the fumes of the phosphorus and the danger of phosphorus poisoning and that the women and children were much more exposed than the men, 95 per cent of the women and 83 per cent of the children under 16 years of age being so exposed.

The number of cases disclosed by this investigation, while very impressive, is not so impressive as the loathsome character of the disease itself. It results from the breathing of the phosphorus fumes in the mixing, dipping, drying, and packing rooms of the factories and from contact with the phosphorus itself, particles becoming attached to the hands and later being transferred to the mouth.

> One of the general effects most frequently noticed in the cases of chronic phosphorus poisoning is anemia and a lowering of vitality. The peculiar local form, however, of phosphorus necrosis is caused by the absorption of the phosphorus through the teeth or gums, minute particles of the poison entering usually through the cavities of decayed teeth, setting up inflammation which, if not quickly arrested, extends along the jaw, killing the teeth and bones.
> The gums become swollen and purple, the teeth loosen and drop out, and the jawbones slowly decompose and pass away in the form of nauseating pus, which sometimes breaks through the neck in the form of an abscess or, if not almost continually washed out, oozes into the mouth, where it mixes with the saliva and is swallowed.

When once this disease is established a surgical operation is often the only means of arresting the process of decay. In many instances it has been found necessary to remove the entire jaw, and in several cases both jaws have been removed at a single operation.

The evil effects of the use of phosphorus in the manufacture of matches was discovered in Europe shortly after the invention of the phosphorus match. For a time some of the European countries sought to lessen this disease or to wholly eradicate it through regulation. This regulation consisted in the rigid inspection of the factories, thorough sanitation, thorough ventilation, and other means of making the workrooms sanitary, the enforcement of rigid rules as to hours of labor, cleanliness, and inspection of the teeth of the employees by competent experts. Notwithstanding such regulation, however, this terrible disease continued to prevail, although in somewhat lessened degree. As a result of these rigid requirements and the increased cost to the manufacturer resulting from their enforcement, many small establishments were wiped out, and because of the complaints from small manufacturers some of the Governments, like Switzerland, abandoned regulation and finally resorted to the prohibition of the use of the poisonous phosphorus.

In 1872 Finland prohibited the use of white phosphorus in her match factories. Denmark followed in 1874. In these countries no case of phosphorus necrosis has been discovered in the last 35 years.

In France the matchmaking business is in the hands of the Government. As it reimburses its own employees injured in its service and the cost for reimbursement resulting from phosphorus poisoning became a series charge on its treasury it appointed a commission to find an innocuous substitute. As a result the sesquisulphide of phosphorus was discovered, and shortly thereafter, in 1897, France prohibited the use of white phosphorus.

Switzerland decided on prohibition in 1898; the Netherlands in 1901. In 1906 the International Association for Labor Legislation secured an international convention at Berne, Switzerland, which resulted in an international treaty, providing for the "absolute prohibition of the manufacture, importation, or sale of matches made from white phosphorus." This treaty was signed by France, Denmark, Luxemburg, Italy, Switzerland, the Netherlands, and Germany.

In December, 1908, after a most rigid test by way of regulation, England came to the conclusion that the only way to eradicate the disease was through prohibition, and passed an act which became effective January 1, 1910, and joined the other countries in signing the Berne treaty.

Section 1 of the British act is as follows:

It shall not be lawful for any person to use white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches, and any factory in which white phorphorus is so used shall be deemed to be a factory not kept in conformity with the factory and workshop act, 1901, and that act shall apply accordingly.

Sweden does not permit the use of the poisonous matches at home, but allows their manufacture for export to other countries, including the United States.

Russia has attempted to eradicate the disease by taxing matches made out of white phosphorus. She has so far succeeded that in 1906 only 1 out of every 50 matches manufactured within her domains contained the poisonous phosphorus.

In addition to the countries already mentioned, Austria and Spain have prohibited the use of white phosphorus, while Australia has prohibited the importation of matches made of this material.

On November 24, 1910, a bill was introduced in the Canadian House of Commons framed along the lines of the British act. Section 3 of this proposed act is as follows:

It shall not be lawful for any person to use white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches.

Section 4 prohibits the importation into Canada of matches made of this material.

It will thus be seen that practically every civilized country, with the exception of Japan, Belgium, and Hungary, which have laws strictly regulating the operation of match factories, and the United States, have prohibited the use of this dangerous poison.

Not a single State has passed laws prohibiting its use, only the State of Ohio restricting the employment of children in match factories. Three other States—New York, Pennsylvania, and Oklahoma—have endeavored to prevent employers from using children of tender years in match manufacturing, but such legislation affords no protection to older employees.

In the matter of protecting the health of employees in match factories, the United States holds the unenviable position of being the leading civilized nation of the world which does not prohibit either the exportation or importation or the manufacture for domestic use of white phosphorus matches. The necessity for such legislation from the data thus far furnished being manifest, the question arises how best to meet this evil and eradicate it.

Several methods of procedure and lines of relief have been proposed, namely: (1) Through State regulation or prohibition; (2) through the treaty-making power of the Federal Government; (3) through the power granted by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution; (4) through the taxing power under the Constitution.

A brief discussion of each of these plans or methods may be of interest:

First. Owing to the ever-increasing interstate character of modern business, State regulation or prohibition will be wholly ineffective. If one State sought to control the match-making industry by rigid and suppressive limitations, necessitating inspection, sanitation, and medical attendance, the factories of such State would be unable to meet the competition of manufacturers of other States who are not subjected to such control, nor could such State prohibit the introduction of poisonous matches within its borders which had been manufactured in other States, the same being at the time an article of interstate commerce.

If such State method of regulation sought to prohibit the manufacture of matches made out of white or yellow phosphorus, it would drive the match-making industry beyond its borders, as the manufacturer, being compelled to use an innocuous but more expensive substitute, would again be unable to meet the competition of outside manufacturers. In either event, the State would by its own act lose an industry. Moreover, the task of securing such regulation of this industry in all the States of the Union would be almost insurmountable. There would be no assurance that there would be uniformity in such legislation. Every State would fix its own standards and its own requirements, and there would be every degree of enforcement of these several State laws. It would be exceedingly difficult and burdensome for the manufacturers doing an extensive interstate business to comply with the varying provisions of the enactments of the several States. There would be the same necessity for the uniformity of standards and requirements in this matter, as was found to be necessary when Congress enacted the pure foods and drugs act. Even though the manufacturers may be prohibited from the manufacture of poisonous matches for sale within the State, this prohibition of the State would not extend to matches manufactured by them, but sold for interstate shipments. From every aspect, therefore, State regulation or prohibition would bring chaos to the match-making industry and would eventually prove burdensome if not ineffectual.

Second. Nor would it be possible through the treaty-making power to prohibit the manufacture of matches within the several States. The treaty-making power could only extend to the prohibition of the importation and exportation of matches made out of white or yellow phosphorus. In other words, it could only extend to commercial relations between ourselves and foreign countries.

As the United States has not as yet signed the Berne treaty and as no law has as yet been passed by Congress prohibiting the importation of white phosphorus matches, American citizens are helpless as against such importation. It must be stated, however, that few such matches are now imported, the great majority being safety matches made with the use of a nonpoisonous substance. As the United States exported in 1908 only $68,000 worth of matches of domestic make, prohibition of exportation would not be a serious restraint of our match-making industry.

As stated in the excellent brief of Miles M. Dawson, counsel for the American Association for Labor Legislation, filed with the Committee on Ways and Means—

> The Government may enter into a treaty to prohibit the exportation or the importation of matches manufactured with poisonous phosphorus, but to attempt to prohibit their manufacture within a State, for sale therein, would be to invade the internal police of the States under the form of a treaty, but without any connection with international relations. The Federal Government may by treaty confer rights on foreigners, but can scarcely enter into stipulations, the only effect of which would be upon its own citizens, not in any relation to the foreign government, but wholly in their relation to one another.

Third. Can white or yellow phosphorus in the match-making industry be effectually prohibited under the commerce clause of the Constitution? I do not believe that any law which Congress could enact under such a warrant would be effective. I have no doubt of the power of Congress to pass a law prohibiting the transportation in interstate commerce of matches made of white or yellow phosphorus. The pure foods and drugs act, the vaccine act, and other similar legislation might be cited in support of such proposed legislation.

Such legislation could not prevent the manufacture of matches for sale within a State, and as many of our States afford ample markets for the output of any single factory, its total output, if confined to its own State, would be wholly beyond the reach of an act of Congress.

Fourth. The only recourse, therefore, providing the effectual remedy necessary is the taxing power as exercised by Congress under constitutional limitations.

Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution requires that "All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States," and section 9 of the same article provides that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration provided for in that instrument.

Subject to these two limitations and the prohibition as to exports, Congress can tax all taxable objects, even though such tax results in the destruction of an industry, for under the decision of Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of McCullough v. Maryland, "The power to tax involves the power to destroy." This power has been exercised by Congress in several independent instances, and the legislation has been upheld by the Supreme Court.

In the case of Hilton v. The United States, decided in 1796, a tax on carriages was held valid.

In Veazie Bank v. Fenno, decided in 1869, a prohibitive tax levied on the circulating notes of State banks was sustained, the court holding it a tax which "may very well be classed under the head of duties," and declaring:

> The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons, but the responsibility of the legislature is not to the courts, but to the people by whom its members are elected.

In the case of McCrea v. United States, decided in 1904, the tax on oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter was upheld.

The imposition of a tax of 1 cent per 100 matches, as provided in the bill, would be prohibitive and would compel the use of an innocuous substitute such as the sesquisulphide of phosphorus.

After a thorough examination of these several forms of remedial legislation, I came to the conclusion that the last form would be the most effectual, and therefore, at the request of the American Association for Labor Legislation, I introduced on June 3 the first draft of a bill providing for such a tax.

This bill was drawn up by the above association. After much consideration and consultation with various departments of the Government, certain amendments were suggested so as to make the law workable, the final result being the introduction, on December 19, 1910, of House bill 30022, entitled "A bill to provide for a tax on white phosphorus, and for other purposes."

Upon this bill elaborate hearings were had before the House Committee on Ways and Means, but no final action was taken at this session.

As a result of the investigation made by Dr. Andrews and published in the bulletin of the Bureau of Labor, and the publicity given to this report throughout the country, and the agitation which such publicity aroused and the new agitation following the introduction of the bill last June, the President became so deeply interested as to the necessity of legislation by Congress to put an end to the baneful effects of the use of the poisonous phosphorus in the manufacture of matches, that in his annual message to Congress last December he made a recommendation in the following words:

> I invite attention to the very serious injury caused to all those who are engaged in the manufacture of phosphorus matches. The diseases incident to this are frightful, and as matches can be made from other materials entirely innocuous, I believe that the injurious manufacture could be discouraged and ought to be discouraged by the imposition of a heavy Federal tax. I recommend the adoption of this method of stamping out a very serious abuse.

Notwithstanding the widespread interest manifested on this subject and appeals that came to Congress from thousands of citizens, civic bodies, and State legislatures, the Committee on Ways and Means did not believe that it was in such full possession of all the facts as to warrant final action on the bill last introduced by me.

In lieu of reporting this bill to the House with a favorable recommendation, the committee on February 21 reported a joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a competent person to investigate the manufacture of white phosphorus matches and report at the next regular session of Congress.

The scope of such investigation is contained in these words:

> First. Present conditions of manufacture as affecting the health of employees.
>
> Second. What, if any, substitutes for white phosphorus can be found by which the dangers can be minimized in the manufacture, distribution, and use of matches.
>
> Third. Whether these substitutes are free from patent control and secret formulas for manufacture and open and unrestricted to general use, and not of excessive cost as compared with the matches now produced.
>
> Fourth. Complete and detailed information as to the commercial conditions under which this industry is carried on, whether controlled by any combination or trust, and whether the sale of the product is in any way restricted or regulated by the producers, beyond the point of free and reasonable competition in trade, and whether the proposed prohibition of the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches would tend toward a monopoly of what has become a necessity of life.
> SEC. 2. That the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of this inquiry and investigation.

This resolution, after debate on the floor, was adopted without amendment on February 27, and was sent over to the Senate, where it was amended by striking out practically all of its provisions and substituting one confining the investigation to this single inquiry, "Whether or not white phosphorus matches were fit subjects for interstate commerce."

The House refused to concur in the Senate amendment, and asked for a conference. The conferees met, but failed to agree, and so the resolution failed of passage. This leaves the entire subject to be revived in the Sixty-second Congress, but the discussion of the bill, and the publicity given to the same, and the widespread demand which has come from every State of the Union for this legislation have assured me that Congress will not long defer favorable action thereon. Even though both the bill and the resolution failed, some good has already come as a result of their consideration.

Shortly after the introduction of the first bill in June, 1910, the Diamond Match Co., an alleged trust, producing over 66 per cent of all the matches manufactured in the United States, felt that legislation either by the several States or by Congress was inevitable. It therefore went on record as favoring Federal as against State legislation, and made overtures to the various independent manufacturers of the country looking to an agreement whereby they—both trust and independents—should discontinue the use of the white and yellow phosphorus and substitute the sesquisulphide form of phosphorus, this being considered the most innocuous and at the same time most practical.

As the Diamond Match Co. had, however, purchased of the French Republic about 12 years ago the sesquisulphide patent, it controlled its use in the United States, and therefore had an advantage over the independent manufacturers. If the bill as originally introduced had passed and the Diamond Match Co. retained its patent rights, it would have strengthened its hold upon the match-making industry, not merely on account of its larger output, but because of its ownership of this patent, and on this account the independents protested against its enactment.

The Diamond Match Co. thereupon voluntarily agreed, in writing, to grant to the several independents the license to use the sesquisulphide process on an equal footing with itself upon certain conditions.

These conditions were as follows:

> The Diamond Match Co. proposes to license manufacturers upon these terms: They will be compelled to pay to the Diamond Co. a proportion of the $100,000 which the Diamond Co. claims to have paid for the patent right in the United States; and in event of the licensee increasing its output beyond that of the year ending June 30, 1910, it is compelled to pay the Diamond Co. a royalty amounting to fourtenths of 1 per cent per 1,000 matches, or about 26 cents per case.

These conditions were accepted by several of the independent manufacturers, but others protested on the ground that the proposed royalty would absolutely prevent any increase in output for their concerns, and would absolutely prevent engaging in the business on the part of any new enterprise. Because of these protests, the Diamond Match Co. subsequently modified this license agreement by cutting out all these limitations, thus seemingly removing all obstacles, save that of permitting new manufacturers on equal terms with those already engaged in the business. To overcome this obstacle the Diamond Match Co., in writing, transferred its patent to a board of three trustees, consisting of Prof. Edwin R. A. Seligman, of New York; Hon. Charles P. Neill, Commissioner of Labor; and Hon. Jackson H. Ralston, of Washington, attorney for the American Federation of Labor. This transfer was made January 6 of this year. This board was given full power to grant licenses to all applicants on reasonable terms for the use of the sesquisulphide of phosphorus.

This action on the part of the Match Trust relieved it of any charge that the enactment of my bill would be of interest to it in promoting its monopoly. In further refutation of this charge it might be stated that by the terms of the bill, it would not become effective until June 1, 1912, and the sesquisulphide patent expires in 1915.

Notwithstanding this transfer of all its rights under its patent of the Diamond Match Co. to this board of trustees, insistent and persistent objections continued to be made against the passage of the bill on the ground that its passage would create a monopoly.

In a letter addressed by this board to President Taft on January 24, 1911, it urged the President—> * * * to inquire as to the advisability of requesting the Diamond Match Co. and its licensees, in the interest of this humane legislation, to cancel the patent, and thereby grant its free use to all other American match manufacturers. Such a step would, we believe, result in removing the already groundless suspicion of monopoly and, as a consequence, force the opponents of the measure to disclose the actual grounds of their opposition.

In response to this suggestion President Taft, on January 26, replied as follows:

My great anxiety to see American labor protected from the ravages of a wholly unnecessary and loathsome disease to the same extent that foreign countries, including Great Britain, have protected their working people in match factories prompts me to believe that everybody would, of course, be glad to see the owner of the patent and its licensees take the public-spirited action of canceling the patent for the use of sesquisulphide in order that this harmless substitute may be gratuitously used by all other American match manufacturers, for it ought to have the effect of dispelling any fear that the enactment of this legislation would result in a monopoly in the match industry.

In response to this intimation to cancel its patent, the Diamond Match Co. and this board of trustees on January 28 of this year filed with the Commissioner of Patents a certificate declaring the surrender of said letters patent for cancellation and formally abandoning and dedicating the invention to the public of the United States of America forever.

This generous and unheard-of action on the part of the Diamond Match Trust absolutely removed the last ground of objection to the bill so far as the independent manufacturers or those contemplating entering the matchmaking industry were concerned, and there can be left but one legitimate argument against its passage, and that is the argument that it seeks to destroy an industry by the exercise of the taxing power.

In view of the humanitarian purpose of the bill and the improbability that its enactment would be considered as a precedent and the conclusive fact that like legislation for a similar purpose has previously been enacted and the overwhelming demand that it be enacted, no reasonable excuse can now be given for further delay.

As indicative of the interest manifested by the press of the country I herewith attach editorials from prominent newspapers in all sections of the United States.

There is another phase of this legislation which has greatly interested a class of people wholly distinct from the match manufacturers or their employees. This class consists of the insurance companies and their policy holders, who see in the enactment of this legislation, which will require the substitution for the dangerous and deadly parlor match of a safe substitute. As indicating the interest shown by the insurers of life and property I have added two letters, both addressed to Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, a Member of the House from Pennsylvania, one from Louis W. Amonson, president of the People's National Fire Insurance Co., of Philadelphia, Pa, the other from Clarence E. Porter, president of the Spring Garden Insurance Co., also of Philadelphia.

There is also added an article from Insurance Statistics, showing casualties resulting from matches in the State of Massachusetts.

[Journal, Topeka, Kans., Dec. 15, 1910.]

MAKE ALL MATCHES "SAFETIES."

"Of the 250,000,000,000 matches used yearly in this country—more than seven a day for every man, woman, and child—four-fifths are of a type that practically every nation of commercial importance prohibits," says the Survey. "For the head of the ordinary 'double dip' parlor match, the tiny round tip, is made of a poison worse than deadly to many of the workers in match factories. Stealing insidiously through a tiny crack in a tooth, it rots the tooth, rots the jawbone, requires mutilating operations, and sometimes results in death after lingering years of suffering. The dead bone, imbedded in living flesh, discharges its foul remains through cheek and mouth. Phosphorus necrosis, commonly called 'phoss jaw,' in matchmakers is so terrible that it might be considered good reason for returning to the flint and steel of our forebears if there were no other way of making fire.

"But there is a harmless substitute, sesquisulphide of phosphorus, for the poisonous white phosphorus. It is to our disgrace that the United States has lagged behind other lands in demanding its use. The indifferent of big business, the tariff, internal-revenue taxes, a 'trust' smothering the harmless but more expensive material, a lack of public information on the subject, and the voiceless obscurity of the match workers have all been factors in our tardy beginning last year to wipe out this unnecessary industrial disease by the Esch bill in Congress."

[Survey, New York City, Jan. 7, 1911.]

TERMS OF LICENSE FOR HARMLESS PHOSPHORUS.

The instinct to "fear the Greeks even bearing gifts" has made many wonder if the Esch bill in Congress to prohibit poisonous phosphorus in matches would not establish a monopoly, since the largest company favors this measure and has patent rights to the most widely used nonpoisonous substitute for white phosphorus. The Diamond Match Co. drew up licenses upon fair, if not generous, terms to govern the use of sesquisulphide of phosphorus by other manufacturers. Eight companies accepted the conditions and have paid in whole or in part their share of the cost of the patent protecting this nonpoisonous composition.

Although each licensee was allowed to produce an unlimited quantity of matches or to use any other form of nonpoisonous phosphorus, of which there are several, some have feared that all the agitation against white phosphorus was but a scheme to place the small independent companies at the mercy of a trust which owns the patent for sesquisulphide. To make this suspicion impossible the president of the Diamond Match Co., in a letter to Representative ESCH, the author of the bill, calls attention to some changes which have been made voluntarily in the licenses already issued. A royalty of four-tenths of a cent for the use of sesquisulphide for every thousand matches beyond the quantity which a company was entitled to make, on the basis of its percentage of the number manufactured for the year ending June 30, 1910, has been remitted, and all restrictions as to the number to be contained in a box waived.

As the president says in his letter, however, "there still remains the problem of how we can best formulate a proposition in respect to granting licenses in the future" to existing manufacturers, or to any other companies that later on may desire permits. He offers to assign the patent in trust to any department or bureau of the Federal Government or to any official of any department and his successor in office, in order that "licenses may be granted on such terms as may appear in the discretion of such department, bureau, or individual equitable and fair." If no department, bureau, or official will accept such an assignment the company offers to execute it in favor of any corporation, association, or individual who can give reasonable assurance of prompt and just treatment of applications for licenses.

The cause of this remarkable offer is said to be the fear of the manufacturers that if Federal legislation is not passed the agitation about the dangers to the workers in the trade will result in State legislation, which will not be uniform throughout the country. In fact a law to prohibit the use of poisonous phosphorus has already been recommended in New York by a high State official.

[Constitution, Atlanta, Ga., Jan. 15, 1911.]

MAKING ALL MATCHES SAFETIES NOT A PLOT OF THE TRUSTS.

Is the Esch bill to prohibit poisonous phosphorus in matches, which is now pending in Congress, a machiavelian scheme to place the small and struggling independent companies in the grasp of a trust notorious in the past for merciless practices? The instinct to "fear the Greeks even bearing gifts" has naturally caused many to look for a sinister connection between the ownership of the patent for the most widely used substitute for white phosphorus by the Diamond Match Co. and its hearty support of the proposed legislation for the protection of match workers.

Eight companies have already contracted for the use of sesquisulphide of phosphorus under terms that allow them to produce an unlimited number of matches and to employ any other form of nonpoisonous phosphorus, of which there are several. But to make all suspicion impossible the Diamond Match Co. has voluntarily remitted a royalty of four-tenths of a cent granted by these contracts for the use of sesquisulphide for every thousand matches beyond the amount which a company was entitled to make on the basis of its percentage of the number manufactured for the year ending June 30, 1910.

As the president says in his letter, however, "there still remains the problem of how we can best formulate a proposition in respect to granting licenses in the future" to existing manufacturers or to any other companies that may later on desire to acquire permits. He offers to assign the patent in trust to any department or bureau of the Federal Government or to any official of any department and his successor in office in order that "licenses may be granted on such terms as may appear in the discretion of such department, bureau, or individual equitable and fair." If no department, bureau, or official will accept such an assignment, the company offers to execute it in favor of any corporation, association, or individual who can give reasonable assurance that applications for licenses will be promptly and justly treated.

The cause that explains this remarkable offer is the fear of the manufacturers that if Federal legislation is not passed the agitation about the dangers in the trade to the workers will result in State legislation that will differ throughout the country and cause unnecessary inconvenience to the business. In fact, such action has already been recommended in New York by a State official. When such an evidence of good faith is given there is no excuse for failure to follow the example of all the other countries of commercial importance by prohibiting the use of a needless and terrible poison in the manufacture of matches.

[People, New York City, Jan. 21, 1911.]

PARTIAL VICTORY AGAINST "PHOSSY JAW."

The Diamond Match Co., commonly known as the Match Trust, has been forced to turn its patent for the most available substitute for poisonous phosphorus in the manufacture of matches over to the three trustees appointed by the American Association for Labor Legislation, which has carried on a campaign for the elimination of the loathsome occupational disease known as "phossy jaw." This step puts an end to all fear that the Match Trust will take advantage of a health campaign to complete its monopoly of the match business.

"Phossy jaw," which threatens 65 per cent of all match-factory workers, will be wiped off the list of occupational disease in America if the Esch phosphorus bill passes in congress. Last year the Labor Legislation Association conducted an investigation, in cooperation with the United States Bureau of Labor, the result being published by the Government in Bulletin No. 86.

Many match manufacturers at first claimed that "phossy jaw" did not exist in America, but they soon admitted that it did. Some of them got busy and started to clean up their factories. But no amount of care in handling the poisonous phosphorus can make the work safe. Safety lies only in the complete prohibition of its use. In June of last year ESCH introduced into Congress a bill providing for a prohibitive Federal tax on white phosphorus.

There are several harmless substitutes for white phosphorus, the best and cheapest being sesquisulphide; but the Diamond Co. owned the patent on sesquisulphide. The association then compelled the Diamond Co. to hand over the patent to three trustees, who have complete control of granting its use to future applicants.

The three trustees are Jackson Ralston, counsel for the American Federation of Labor; Commissioner Neill, of the United States Bureau of Labor; and Prof. Seligman, of Columbia University.

[Union, Springfield, Mass., Jan. 23, 1911.]

The reference in President Taft's recent message to the frightful nature of "phossy jaw," or phosphorus necrosis, a disease which attacks the workers in match factories, and his recommendation that legislation be enacted to prevent the use of the deadly white phosphorus that causes it, will probably have an important effect in expediting the passage of the bill introduced by Congressman JOHN ESCH, which provides for a prohibitive tax on white phosphorus. The use of this poisonous substance is already prohibited in nearly all the European countries, the campaign against it inaugurated in Finland and Denmark having been taken up by Switzerland, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Germany, and Great Britain. White phosphorus is used on four-fifths of the matches sold in the United States, and a recent investigation of the match factories in this country conducted by agents of the United States Bureau of Labor brought to light 16 cases of the terrible necrosis among employees in 15 factories, while 82 cases were discovered in the homes of the working people of three factories, and records of 40 cases were secured in one modern factory. This insidious disease, caused by the fumes of the wet phosphorus, rots the teeth and jawbone, requires mutilating operations, and often results in death after a long and painful illness. There are several harmless substitutes for the phosphorus, one of which, said to be the cheapest and best, is sesquisulphid, which is controlled by one of the largest match-manufacturing concerns. This company, it is announced, has been compelled to turn over its patent on this substance to three trustees appointed by the American Association for Labor Legislation, who will have full power to grant its use to future applicants. These trustees are Jackson Ralston, counsel for the American Federation of Labor; Commissioner Neill, of the Bureau of Labor; and Prof. Seligman, of Columbia University. With the passage of the Esch bill, taxing white phosphorus out of existence, this substitute will be available for all match manufacturers, and there is every prospect of the wiping out of a fearful industrial disease.

[Free Press, Milwaukee, Wis., Jan. 27, 1911.]

A BILL THAT SHOULD PASS.

It would seem that the one legitimate obstacle to the passage of the Esch bill, which aims at the elimination of poisonous phosphorus from the manufacture of matches, has been overcome.

It will be remembered that the Diamond Match Co., or so-called Match Trust, owns the patent rights to the use of sesquisulphid of phosphorus—the harmless kind. In consequence, it was feared by the independent match manufacturers that legislation hostile to the use of the common white phosphorus would tend to make the trust an actual monopoly because of its control of the harmless article.

This objection has now been robbed of its force by the action of the much worried Diamond Match Co., which has assigned its patent rights to a board of trustees that is given absolute power to fix the terms which it thinks are fair under which every match manufacturer will be able to secure the right to use the nonpoisonous substitute for white phosphorus.

The board of trustees consists of Prof. Edwin Seligman, of Columbia University; Charles P. Neill, United States Commissioner of Labor; and Jackson Ralston, an attorney for the American Federation of Labor.

"Their names," comments the Survey, "are a guaranty that all will receive fair treatment and no one will be so suspicious as to charge them with being under the domination of the Match Trust."

The action of the trust in transferring the legal title of its patent must be considered a great victory for the investigations made by the United States Bureau of Labor at the instance of the American Association for Labor Legislation.

These investigations drew a picture of the ravages of phosphorus necrosis among the workers in American match factories that rivaled the horrors of Dante's Inferno. This disease, which is caused by the phosphorus, affects the jaws of the victim and consists of the wholesale mortification of the bones. It is loathsome, disfiguring, and eventually deadly.

The worst part of the terrible indictment lodged against the employers who subjected young human beings to this peril was that the harmless substitute for white phosphorus was at their command, but for financial reasons remained unused.

It will be remembered that President Taft in a recent message strongly urged legislation against this inhuman evil, and the Esch bill, which should now be passed without delay, is a fruit of that recommendation.

[Tribune, Chicago, Ill., Jan. 29, 1911.]

AN INCIDENT IN SOCIAL REFORM.

The Esch bill to prohibit the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches is one of the social measures which Congress should find time to pass at the present session.

White phosphorus is a poison to workers in the match industry, causing necrosis. The Diamond Match Co. some time ago instituted research to find a safe substitute, and the search was successful. But the discovery was a monopoly of this so-called trust, and it was urged against prohibitory legislation that the competitors of the trust would be put to a serious disadvantage by it.

Then the Diamond Match Co. waived its monopoly—an act of humanitarianism which might very well place it among the "good trusts," if it be a "trust"—and with this waiver disappears whatever reason there was for opposition. The independent manufacturers, in fact, have so announced and approved the Esch bill.

The situation is gratifying as an evidence of the growing sense of social responsibility for the conditions of workers. It should be rounded out by the legislative action sought.

[Tribune, New York City, Jan. 30, 1911.]

A HUMANE ACTION.

The Diamond Match Co. has done an unusually public-spirited thing in causing to be canceled the patent held by it upon a harmless substitute for white phosphorus. This leaves independent manufacturers free to employ the substance in the making of matches and removes the only serious obstacle to the passage of the Esch bill prohibiting the use of white phosphorus in the industry. White phosphorus causes necrosis among the workers engaged in its use. Considerations of humanity caused the introduction of the Esch bill, influenced President Taft to interest himself in its passage to the extent of urging the owner of the patent on sesquisulphide of phosphorus to have it canceled, and led the so-called Match Trust to facilitate the passage of the bill by sacrificing what might have been made a monopoly for the next three years.

Throughout the negotiations leading up to this cancellation the Diamond Match Co. appears to have maintained a more than ordinarily reasonable and public-spirited attitude. When its patent was first declared to stand in the way of prohibiting the use of white phosphorus, it put the patent into the hands of trustees, providing that they should make fair terms upon which any manufacturer might employ the patented article in matchmaking. This concession not having been regarded as sufficient, the company surrendered the patent. The action will be worth more to the company in "good will" on the part of the public than the remaining value of the patent, but that does not detract in the least from its commendable quality.

[Tribune, La Crosse, Wis., Jan. 30, 1911.]

ESCH BILL VINDICATED.

"The Esch bill to prohibit the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches," says the Chicago Tribune, "is one of the social measures which Congress should find time to pass at the present session.

"White phosphorus is a poison to workers in the match industry, causing necrosis. The Diamond Match Co. some time ago instituted research to find a safe substitute, and the search was successful. But the discovery was a monopoly of this so-called trust, and it was urged against prohibitory legislation that the competitors of the trust would be put to a serious disadvantage by it.

"Then the Diamond Match Co. waived its monopoly—an act of humanitarianism which might very well place it among the 'good trusts' if it be a 'trust'—and with this waiver disappears whatever reason there was for opposition. The independent manufacturers, in fact, have so announced and approved the Esch bill.

"The situation is gratifying as an evidence of the growing sense of social responsibility for the conditions of workers. It should be rounded out by the legislative action sought."

When the Esch bill first came into the limelight, certain badly advised critics arose to suggest that it was aimed, not to protect working men, but to compel the use of the Match Trust's patent. Even in his own district Mr. ESCH did not escape the gibes of I-told-you-so gentlemen whose skepticism has made them willingly adverse commentators upon his activities, and in whose view the humane feature of the proposed law was but a cover for a sinister purpose. However, if there now remains a vestige of that unkind suspicion, it must yield to the word of La Follette's Magazine, most trustworthy of all progressive publications, which in its current issue said:

"As a sequel to the story told in La Follette's last week about the dreadful effects of phosphorus poisoning in the match industry and the efforts now being made to prevent it by law, comes the information that the objection most strenuously urged against such legislation has been silenced. This was the objection that the passage of a law abolishing the use of poisonous phosphorus in the making of matches would promote a monopoly in the manufacture of matches from the nonpoisonous sesquisulphide. The use of this harmless substance is covered by a patent. The patent is owned by the Diamond Match Co. Forbidden the use of phosphorus, other manufacturers would have to get permission from the owners of the patent before they could change to the sesquisulphide process. It was important to secure complete assurance from the Diamond Match Co. that future applicants for patent rights would be treated fairly. As early as last June the officers of the American Association for Labor Legislation succeeded in convincing the managers of the Diamond Match Co. that they ought, in the interests of humanity, to throw the patent open. This has finally been done. On January 6 the patent was turned over to three trustees, who are given the power to grant its use upon 'such terms' as the trustees 'shall deem just.' The trustees are Prof. E. R. A. Seligman, of Columbia University; Jackson Ralston, counsel for the American Federation of Labor, and United States Commissioner of Labor Charles P. Neill. These names are a strong guarantee of just dealing. The Association of Labor Legislation is to be congratulated upon so successfully disposing of an objection that for a time threatened to block the way to speedy and complete abolition of phosphorus matches and the distressing 'phossy jaw.'"

[Standard Union, Brooklyn, N. Y., Jan. 30, 1911.]

A CORPORATION WITH A SOUL.

The voluntary surrender by the Diamond Match Co. of its patent rights, covering the manufacture and use of a substitute for white phosphorus so that rival companies can take advantage of the preparation is admittedly a very creditable act. This will end the employment of white phosphorus in match making in this country and consequently do away with the disease known as "phossy jaw" among factory workers.

The relinquishment of the patent rights was not an act of courtesy to competing companies, but a concession to the Government, which is anxious to pass a law prohibiting the use, as in the case in several European countries, of white phosphorus. If the Esch bill now before Congress were placed on the statute books and the Diamond Match Co. retained its right, the rival companies would have been seriously injured. For that reason the bill was not likely to pass. It would have given a virtual monopoly to one concern.

If not a trust, the Diamond Match Co. is a near approach to one. Those who hold that there are no good large corporations must admit that at least one has shown admirable qualities.

[Record, Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 30, 1911.]

There was never a better use made of the Federal taxing powers than that proposed in the Esch bill to eliminate the health-destroying white phosphorus from the manufacture of matches. The Federal Government can not regulate production within the States, but the end in view would be accomplished by imposing a sufficient internal-revenue tax on white phosphorus matches to make their manufacture commercially impossible. This would be a perfectly constitutional exercise of Federal power, and it would accomplish a result that could otherwise be attained only by legislation in 46 separate States.

[Public Ledger, Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 30, 1911.]

PROTECTION FOR MATCH WORKERS.

President Taft's recommendation in his annual message for the protection of workmen engaged in the manufacture of matches has borne immediate and interesting fruit. No action has yet been taken on the bill offered by Representative ESCH, of Wisconsin, placing a prohibitive tax upon all matches containing white phosphorus, but by the voluntary initiative of the Diamond Match Co. a situation has been created that opens the way for the passage of such a law free from the suspicion that it is designed to strengthen a monopoly. The making of matches is one of the most dangerous of modern industries, at least under the older methods of manufacture, when the workers were exposed to the fumes of phosphorus, and were almost certain to contract, sooner or later, a loathsome necrosis, or mortification of the bones.

When it was proposed that the United States should at last follow the enlightened lead of Europe in legislation for the restriction of the use of phosphorus and for the protection of the laborers, the assertion was made that the Diamond Match Co.—the corporation which dominates the match industry in this country—controlled patents on the only available substitute for the dangerous forms of phosphorus, and that the imposition of a tax upon all matches made without this substitute would be in effect playing directly into the hands of the monopoly.

This contention of the independent match manufacturers has been vehemently combated, but the Diamond Match Co., nevertheless, has relinquished, in the interest of the public, its patent upon the chemical in question. It is true that this patent has but a few years to run, and that the gift to the public and to humanity has thus but a limited value, but the public-spirited dedication of the company's rights to the people at large has removed every legal obstacle to humane legislation in the interest of public safety and health.

[News, Rutland, Vt., Jan. 30, 1911.]

RENOUNCES A PATENT FOR HUMANITY'S SAKE.

The Match Trust is a trust that certainly has a soul.

Action was taken Saturday by the Diamond Match Co., the largest producer of matches in this country, which probably means the banishment from the match factories of one of the most serious of what are known as "occupational diseases." The Diamond Match Co., at the request of President Taft, has granted free use of its patent for a style of match that does not call for material poisonous to the workers. This action, it is believed, removes the last objection to the bill introduced in Congress by Representative ESCH, of Wisconsin, for the purpose of abolishing the manufacture of the present poisonous style of match.

The common "parlor match" that will strike anywhere contains white phosphorus, so called, to distinguish it from the red or nonpoisonous variety. The use of this substance in the match industry has been the cause of a form of poisoning among the workers, many of whom are women, that destroys the jawbone slowly. The only cure is to cut away the diseased bone, which often results in disfigurement.

Nearly every European country has done away with this horror of the match factory by prohibiting the use of white phosphorus and requiring that a harmless substitute be employed. Agitation having for its object similar action by this country was begun about a year ago, and this year the President, in his annual message, recommended that such action be taken.

A bill was introduced by Mr. ESCH imposing a sufficient internal-revenue tax upon white phosphorus matches to make their manufacture commercially impossible. This bill would probably have met with little opposition had the fact not developed that the patent for the most practicable form of nonpoisonous match was owned by the Diamond Match Co., or, as it is popularly known, the Match Trust.

The trust declared that it welcomed this reform, and as evidence of its good faith was willing to share the patent on equal terms with all who cared to make use of it, and subsequently entered into agreement with nearly all the independents, representing about 95 per cent of the output, by which these independents were licensed to use the patent.

[Times-Star, Cincinnati, Ohio, Feb. 1, 1911.]

IN THE CAUSE OF HUMANITY.

The urgent recommendation made in the President's annual message to Congress for the protection of those engaged in the manufacture of matches has borne fruit more quickly than many of the most sanguine had dared to hope.

The bill offered by Representative ESCH, of Wisconsin, to prevent the use of the death-spreading white phosphorus by placing a prohibitive internal-revenue tax upon it has not yet been acted upon. But the one and only real objection made to it has been met by the action of the corporation popularly known as the Match Trust in surrendering its patent rights to the exclusive use of sesquisulphide, the only substitute for white phosphorus now known. It was the contention of the independent match companies that prohibiting the use of white phosphorus would result in giving the Match Trust a monopoly. Of course this argument now falls to the ground.

It now seems reasonably certain that the day has arrived for the complete reform of an industry that has claimed many victims and in which a frightful death is the almost sure reward of steady employment. It is a great step forward in the cause of humanity.

[States, New Orleans, La., Feb. 2, 1911.]

PROTECTING THE MATCH WORKERS.

In line with President Taft's recommendation in his annual message for the protection of workmen engaged in the manufacture of matches, Representative ESCH, of Wisconsin, introduced in Congress a bill placing a prohibitive duty upon all matches containing white phosphorus. No action has been taken by the House on the measure, but it has borne fruit in the voluntary action of the Diamond Match Co., known as the Match Trust, which opens the way for the passage of such a law which will be free from the suspicion that it is designed to promote the interests of a monopoly.

Under the older methods of manufacture it is known that the making of matches is a very dangerous industry because the workmen are exposed to the fumes of phosphorus, and in the course of time they contract necrosis, a disease that causes a loathsome mortification of the bones. Some years ago prominent humanitarians urged the United States to follow the example of England in legislation restricting the use of phosphorus and for the protection of the match workers, but at the time it was asserted that the Match Trust, which dominates the industry in this country, controlled patents on the only substitute for the dangerous forms of phosphorus, and the imposition of a tax upon all matches made without this substitute would greatly strengthen a monopoly.

This was the contention of the independent match manufacturers, which was combated by the Diamond Match Co.; but nevertheless that concern recently announced that it had relinquished in the interest of the public its patent upon the chemical substitute for phosphorus, and this generous action has removed all opposition to legislation such as Representative ESCH has proposed.

[Herald, Louisville, Ky., Feb. 13, 1911.]

FOR HUMAN LIFE.

A bill is now pending in Congress that has for its sole aim the protection of human life from a peril of industry that is increasing tremendously in the scope of its menace.

It is known as the Esch bill and aims to prohibit the white phosphorus match as an article of manufacture and sale by imposing a tax so heavy that it will make its continued production unprofitable.

The white phosphorus match is poisonous. The making of it is fraught with deadly danger, and its subsequent use is a constant cause of loss, both to life and property. The fearful disease of necrosis, commonly known among workers in match factories as "phossy jaw," is a direct result of the employment of this particular form of phosphorus. Few of those who engage in the making of these matches can hope to escape its painful and terrible ravages.

It is not a necessary evil. The safety match that the smoker buys for a penny a box and which ignites only on the prepared surface provided is free from this poisonous substance. The red phosphorus match is also unobjectionable. There would be no serious inconvenience to anybody by the abolition of this wicked industry.

Statistics show that the white phosphorus match is to be credited with a large proportion of the fires that result disastrously to property and life. Out of 3,875 fires last year in Chicago of which the cause is known 1,089 were started by matches. The hazard of the safety match and of those made with red phosphorus is much less than that resulting from the white phosphorus variety.

President Taft has expressed his approval of the Esch bill; it is indorsed by health departments, medical organizations, and labor unions. It is opposed by the manufacturers who make money at the cost of human life.

Recently the Canadian minister of labor introduced a Government bill in parliament framed to accomplish the same purpose as that of the Esch bill. We have not followed its fortunes, but the auspices under which it was given place on the order paper assures its enactment.

It is doubtful if the Esch bill will reach consideration at the present session. The pressure of other questions of greater political, if less human, concern may require postponement of action. But it ought to pass at the earliest opportunity. It is typical of a class of legislation of which there is going to be more as we realize more keenly our responsibility for safeguarding life and making existence easier and happier for the multitude.

[World, New York City, Feb. 19, 1911.]

Congress should not adjourn without passing the Esch bill prohibiting the use of poison phosphorus in matches. Since the Diamond Match Co., at the request of President Taft, placed the sesquisulphide patent in the hands of trustees for free general use there is no possible objection to the bill. The poison phosphorus not only gives "phossy jaw" to the workers, but it is dangerous in the home.

[Gazette, Green Bay, Wis., Feb. 22, 1911.]

FOR THE SAKE OF HUMANITY.

The Esch bill, which has been introduced in the United States House of Representatives, providing for the abolition of the use of poisonous phosphorus in the manufacture of matches, will, if passed, be the means of saving many lives and also intense suffering. Sixty-five per cent of all match workers are liable to contract the disease known as "phossy jaw," while 95 per cent of the women and 83 per cent of the children are so exposed, it is claimed. The list of the victims are growing monthly.

The disease is caused by the absorption of phosphorus through the teeth or gums. Inflammation is set up, which extends along the jaw, killing the teeth and bones. The gums become swollen and purple, the teeth loosen and drop out, and the jawbone finally becomes decomposed, which sometimes breaks through the neck, forming an abscess. In this manner an employee of any match factory where poisonous phosphorus is used is exposed. Not only are deaths caused in this manner, but it is commonly learned that children die as a result of eating the heads of matches. Some of the State legislatures in the United States have memorialized Congress to pass the bill as introduced in Congress, while others, it is reported, are to take a similar action.

It has been contended by opponents of the Esch bill that it is unconstitutional, since it attempts to protect the public health through the use of the taxing power of Congress. It is held by others, however, that if it is constitutional to levy a tax in the interests of an industry, as is done by the tariff system, and if it is constitutional to levy a tax on the circulating notes of State banks, then it is constitutional to levy a tax in the broader interests of public health and safety. It is almost assured that nothing will be done with this measure during this short session, but many associations and societies in the country are now earnestly at work in an effort to have it passed and enacted into a law.

[Times, New York City, Feb. 22, 1911.]

MR. ESCH'S "PHOSSY-JAW" BILL.

Now that the Diamond Match Co. has canceled its patent for making matches by the harmless sesquisulphide of phosphorus process, so that every match manufacturer can use this process free of cost, it becomes incumbent on Congress to tax out of existence what is in effect the murderous trade of making matches that inflicts on the factory workers the disease of "phossy jaw," so called, from the effects of the poisonous white and yellow phosphorus used

We have already called public attention to this terrible business. The only remedy for the agonizing disease of the jaws which the phosphorus causes when absorbed through teeth or gums is the cutting out of the diseased bone, often amounting to the entire jaw. President Taft has personally inquired into the conditions in the match factories; he recommends the passage of the Esch bill, laying heavy taxes on all factories that fail to use the harmless substitutes for the poisonous phosphorus as a "method of stamping out a very serious abuse." Besides its responsibility for "phossy jaw," the phosphorus is frequently a cause of death in little children, who suck off the heads of the matches in which it is an ingredient. Letters to Congressmen urging the passage of the Esch bill would be influential.

[Tribune, New York, Mar. 1, 1911.]

"PHOSSY JAW" OR PROFITS?

It is strange and discreditable that antiphosphorus legislation seems to be in danger of failing, and the worst feature of the case is the reason therefor. The evils of phosphorus poisoning are well known. The campaign in Great Britain against "matchmakers' necrosis," popularly called "phossy jaw," some years ago largely roused the world to a recognition of the inhumanity of the industry thus conducted and of the need of reform. Happily, methods of reform were not lacking. The evil is as needless as it is monstrous. Yet remedial or prohibitory legislation is thwarted over a mere question of pecuniary profits.

Now, if this legislation were thus blocked by some manufacturing concern which did not wish its profits interfered with, there would be a storm of indignation against the soulless corporation which sacrificed human health and lives to its greed. But in this case something like the reverse is true. That is to say, those who oppose this much-needed reform do so because they are afraid that it would result in larger profits for some corporation. They are not willing that good shall be done lest somebody profit from it. We really can not see that such opposition is more creditable, or less discreditable, than the other would be.

But there is no convincing proof that the reform would have the result of adding to anybody's profits. If it did, that would be no argument against it. Indeed, it might even be argued that a concern which had the enterprise and the humanity to adopt a harmless substitute for the pernicious phosphorus was entitled to its reward. There is certainly no indication that any such advantage, if it existed, would work hardship to the public. If there were danger of that, we should still urge the reform, because it ought to be possible through other action to prevent such oppressive results. To argue that undoubted good should not be done because of a danger of possible evil is a counsel of impotence with which there should be no sympathy.

PEOPLE'S NATIONAL FIRE INSURANCE CO.,
Philadelphia, February 21, 1911.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There is a bill pending before Congress at the present time prohibiting the use of white phosphorus in match manufacturing, because of the very serious injury caused to all who are engaged in the manufacture of matches. I find, however, on careful examination that this bill does not prohibit the interstate sale and transportation of the so-called "criminal match," namely, matches that ignite by being stepped upon, and I would strongly urge that the bill be amended accordingly before passage, to prohibit dangerous matches of all kinds.

The well-known safety match does not contain white phosphorus, is nonpoisonous, and as the ordinary friction matches are infinitely more destructive to life and property, it would be for the general welfare to make the prohibition include all matches that do not ordinarily require a prepared surface for ignition. Thousands of lives have been lost through the serious fires that have resulted from the use of the "criminal match," and a large proportion of all fires reported throughout the country, destructive to the property interests of the American Nation, arise from so-called "parlor matches." You have probably in your own experience known of some of the numerous cases where women have stepped on such matches and set themselves on fire. Children play with them, because they furnish attractive fireworks; rats and mice nibble them and set homes on fire; and an ordinary box of parlor matches can be ignited even by being thrown on the floor.

If fires originating from this cause were eliminated, it would save thousands of lives and reduce the cost of insurance to policy holders, as the enormous fire waste of the country is necessarily charged for in the established rates. State Fire Marshal Sullivan, of Louisiana, and State Fire Marshal Zueber, of Ohio, together with other State authorities and fire-insurance commissioners in various parts of the country have made recommendations for the enactment of such legislation, but the most effective way of preventing loss of life and property from this cause would be by amending the pending bill so as to prohibit matches of all kinds except "safety matches," after January 1, 1912. Is not the general public entitled to protection as well as the comparatively few employees of match factories?

Trusting that your sense of public spirit and interest in the general welfare will prompt you to demand an amendment of this kind, I remain, Yours, very truly, LOUIS S. AMONSON, President.

THE SPRING GARDEN INSURANCE CO.,
Philadelphia, February 21, 1911.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As one of your constituents, we are writing to request you to use your vote and influence to secure the passage of the Esch bill, to prevent the further use of white phosphorus matches. We understand that this bill is intended to promote the public health by preventing the use of a dangerous material. We approve that motive, but beg to suggest an additional reason, in that the white phosphorus match is chiefly responsible for the thousands of fires started by matches each year in this country, and the hundreds of deaths and fatal burnings which result. We are informed that the kind of matches which will be available, if the white phosphorus match is prohibited, are very much less dangerous from the fire standpoint, and think that this feature should also be taken into consideration. The State fire marshals are beginning campaigns against the use of parlor matches, which they call "the criminal match," because of the number of deaths, accidents, and fires for which it is responsible. It is estimated that match fires cost the country $20,000,000 each year, in addition to the loss of life, which falls chiefly upon women whose skirts are ignited by matches catching fire underfoot, and children who are set on fire while playing with matches.

In the interest of public health and safety, to reduce the fire waste of the country, and thus to conserve its resources, we respectfully urge you to use your vote and influence in behalf of the Esch bill.

Faithfully yours, CLARENCE E. PORTER, President.

[Extracts from Insurance Statistics.]

THE MENACE OF THE MATCH—CARELESSNESS WITH MATCHES BRINGS FIRE AND DEATH.

The number of persons burned to death in the United States each year by the common poisonous phosphorus parlor match is between eight and nine hundred, and the property loss more than $2,000,000.

In Massachusetts last year there were 5,794 fires, 1,230 of which, entailing a loss of $658,346, were caused by matches.

Thirty-six women and children were burned to death in Ohio through having their clothing fired by matches. Of these, who suffered death in this, its most horrible form, 30 were children playing with matches left carelessly within their reach, and 6 were women whose clothing took fire from flying match heads. Among these are not included 5 mothers who were themselves burned to death while trying to save the lives of their burning children.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Bureau of Labor made an investigation of the use of white phosphorus in match factories, which was published, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] states, in a bulletin a year ago, in January. The President of the United States, becoming interested in the matter and thinking the subject might be controlled under the commerce clause of the Constitution, turned the papers over to me as chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That was before any bills were pending. With those papers was a letter from the Diamond Match Co., offering to give the use of the patent it owned to any independent company at that time. During last summer I carried on quite an extensive correspondence with the dentists throughout the country. The use of white phosphorus in matches, where there is a cavity in the tooth, causes the phosphorus to get into the tooth, and causes what is called a phossy jaw, which is a putrefaction or wearing away of the jaw. And the dentists are the ones who come in contact with it. So far as I can learn, while there was in many places the phossy jaw, as a rule it has been grossly exaggerated as to the number of people suffering from it throughout the United States.

However, I prepared a bill to regulate the subject by forbidding the transportation of these white phosphorus matches in interstate commerce. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] had a bill to tax them out of existence. That went before the Committee on Ways and Means, which had hearings on it. Our committee had no hearings on it, and it seems to me that with the little information which I could obtain through rather full correspondence with dentists throughout the country, and with the question involved as to whether this would in the end result to the benefit of the Diamond Match Co. and against the interests of the independent manufacturers, the resolution submitted by the Ways and Means Committee at this time is the very thing. We ought to have some real knowledge of the subject. The information that was acquired before can not be said to have been wholly disinterested. A gentleman, a competent man, but an enthusiast on one side of the question, made all the investigation that was made, and was thoroughly committed to the proposition that no one in this country ought to be permitted to use white or yellow phosphorus. On the other hand, it is claimed they can not make in this country matches under the Diamond Match or French patents successfully owing to climatic conditions. If that is so, we can ascertain by investigation. An investigation certainly may do good, and can do no harm.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I will occupy that much time, but this resolution has grown out of a trade disease existing in the match-manufacturing industry, and that disease has become so pronounced that it is necessary that something should be done to prevent it. When an effort was made by the introduction of a bill by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] to regulate the manufacture of matches from white and yellow phosphorus, and hearings were held by the committee, immediately the question was raised as to whether this effort to regulate the manufacture of matches had for its basis the protection of the health of those engaged in its manufacture, or whether it had for its basis the protection of the Match Trust.

There were those who were independent manufacturers of matches who contended that under certain regulations and conditions the matches might be manufactured with a reasonable degree of health on the part of the workers, and that the movement was a movement to promote the interests of the Match Trust of this country. And so there grew opposition to the measure introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. There is still some doubt in the minds of those who have been giving attention to the subject. The matter has not been cleared up, and in my judgment this resolution ought to be adopted. We ought to get the actual facts in the case as to how much disease exists as the result of the use of white and yellow phosphorus, as to how much the passage of a resolution or a bill such as the gentleman from Wisconsin has introduced will affect the match industry, and whether or not it will tend to build up a monopoly in the trade. In other words, how far this industry can be conducted in a healthy condition without at the same time promoting the building up of a trust. In my judgment, this resolution ought to go through for the purpose of giving us information from sources that are not biased by their business interests, upon which we can build satisfactory future legislation.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, there is no one else desiring any time on this side of the House as far as I know.

Mr. GAINES. I would like to ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to move an amendment.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield.

Mr. GAINES. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to amend, by inserting on page 2, of line 15, after the word "conditions," these words: "And costs in this and foreign countries."

Mr. COX of Indiana. I object, Mr. Speaker, to that.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The question now is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and, two-thirds voting in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the joint resolution was passed.

DEBT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ETC.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 13474) to provide for the payment of the debt of the District of Columbia and to provide for permanent improvements, and for other purposes, with committee amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 13474) to provide for the payment of the debt of the District of Columbia and to provide for permanent improvements, and for other purposes, with sundry amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I was first going to ask to have the bill read and then ask to have certain amendments read, but——

The SPEAKER. Other amendments than those reported?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that he withdraw that bill and offer another bill, and move to pass that other bill with the amendments that he is prepared to send up.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will do that, Mr. Speaker. I can send up a bill which contains all but one amendment that I wish to offer, as suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Michigan prepared to withdraw his motion and make another?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill as sent now to the Clerk's desk, with one amendment, which I will send up in a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, with an amendment. The Clerk will report the bill and amendment.

The Clerk read the bill (S. 3260) to provide for the payment of the debt of the District of Columbia, and to provide for permanent improvements, and for other purposes, with sundry amendments.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule a second is ordered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the amendment just reported by the Clerk did not state where it was to be inserted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be reported as it will read when the amendments are inserted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that that is the way it has just been read. The Chair is informed at the Clerk's desk that though this is numbered as a Senate bill it has not yet passed the Senate, or at least has not come to the House, but that the gentleman from Michigan is seeking to pass it as a House bill. Is that correct?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is correct, and if I can have the attention of the House I think I can make my position entirely clear. But to save time, Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause in the House bill and insert what I have sent to the Clerk's desk. I desire to modify my motion so as to get before the House exactly what I want to do. The House bill which I sent to the Clerk's desk had these amendments exactly as in the Senate print. I do not want to mislead anybody in the House. Some Members seem to think that some of the amendments in the Senate print are not in the bill that I sent to the desk.

Mr. OLMSTED. I understand the gentleman's desire is to move to suspend the rules and pass the House bill in the form in which he has sent it up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is the desire of the gentleman from Michigan to take the House bill, move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert, and to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is it the gentleman is going to insert?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands it, the gentleman wants to pass the text of the bill introduced in the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has the bill passed the Senate?

Mr. MANN. No; this is not a Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that, without further interrupting the business of the House at this time, this matter be postponed until to-morrow, so that we can find out what the motion is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I was about to ask, in view of the fact that so many Members want to see the bill reprinted, that we have a reprint of the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, this matter will come up as unfinished business to-morrow.

Mr. SIMS. And I ask unanimous consent that the bill as offered may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the bill (H. R. 13474) as amended, which it is proposed to pass under a motion to suspend the rules:

A bill (H. R. 13474) to provide for the payment of the debt of the District of Columbia and to provide for permanent improvements, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after June 30, 1911, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in determining the estimates of funds available for appropriation for each succeeding fiscal year, shall first provide for and set aside from the estimated District revenues a sufficient sum to meet all estimated and fixed charges required by law to be paid wholly from said revenues, including interest at 3 per cent on the annual balance due the United States on account of advances made to the District of Columbia, and including further the sum of $360,000 as a repayment on account of said advances until the indebtedness of the District of Columbia to the United States shall be extinguished, and the annual estimates of appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, exclusive of the charges aforesaid and including amounts estimated or to be estimated under any general appropriation bill, shall not exceed in the aggregate a sum equal to twice the amount of the said District revenues then remaining: Provided, That the said commissioners shall allow for the extinguishment of the bonded debt of the District of Columbia out of the combined revenue fund by annually including in their estimates of appropriations a sum equal to the sum heretofore annually appropriated for the interest and sinking fund, namely, $975,408, until the said debt as evidenced by outstanding bonds shall be extinguished: Provided further, That hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall provide in their estimates of appropriations for permanent works of improvement a sum not less than $1,230,000, beginnig with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and annually thereafter an amount not less than the same sum increased by the sum of $100,000 for each succeeding fiscal year until and including the fiscal year to end June 30, 1924, and said estimates for permanent improvements shall include the reclamation of the Anacostia flats above the Navy Yard Bridge and their conversion into a park or parks, the gradual extension of the park system of the District, the construction of buildings on lands now authorized to be acquired for such purposes, the construction of public wharves, the extensions of trunk water and sewer mains into the suburban portions of the District, the elimination of dangerous grade crossings, and such other permanent public works as may be authorized by Congress from time to time.

BILLS SENT TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 10430. An act to authorize the establishment of a marine biological station on the Gulf coast of the State of Florida;

H. R. 23015. An act to protect the dignity and honor of the uniform of the United States;

H. R. 24153. An act for the relief of John Marshall; and

H. R. 32440. An act authorizing the Moline, East Moline & Watertown Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the south branch of the Mississippi River from a point in the village of Watertown, Rock Island County, Ill., to the island known as Campbells Island.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the following bills:

H. R. 5453. An act for the relief of the legal representatives of M. N. Swofford, deceased;

H. R. 10430. An act to authorize the establishment of a marine biological station on the Gulf coast of the State of Florida;

H. R. 26606. An act for the relief of Charles A. Caswell;

H. R. 28215. An act to fix the time of holding the circuit and district courts for the northern district of West Virginia; and

H. R. 32440. An act authorizing the Moline, East Moline & Watertown Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the south branch of the Mississippi River from a point in the village of Watertown, Rock Island County, Ill., to the island known as Campbells Island.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 10792. An act to promote the erection of a memorial in conjunction with a Perry's victory centennial celebration on Put in Bay Island during the year 1913 in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the Battle of Lake Erie and the northwestern campaign of Gen. William Henry Harrison in the War of 1812; and

S. 10882. An act to authorize the county of Ouachita, in the State of Arkansas, to construct a bridge across the Ouachita River.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following bills, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 18014. An act to amend section 996 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of February 19, 1897;

H. R. 32344. An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest; and

H. R. 30570. An act to authorize the receipt of certified checks drawn on national banks for duties on imports and internal taxes, and for other purposes.

Also, that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Senate resolution 372.

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow on account of the death of the Hon. CHARLES QUINCY TIRRELL, late a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tributes may be paid his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Senate resolution 371.

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow on account of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM C. LOVERING, late a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tributes may be paid his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of Mr. LOVERING and Mr. TIRRELL, the Senate do now adjourn.

Also that the Senate had passed the following resolution (S. Res. 373):

Resolved, That the Secretary be requested to inform the House of Representatives that the enrolled Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 145) providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur on March 1, 1911, in the board of regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress is now and was in the possession of the House when the House requested its return on the 24th of February, having been delivered to the House on the 23d of February, signed by the Speaker.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 18512. An act for the relief of S. H. Robinson, of Allegheny County, Pa.; and

H. R. 26656. An act to prevent the disclosure of national-defense secrets.

Also that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to return to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, the engrossed copy of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 145) providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur on March 1, 1911, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

Also that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 41):

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 5,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 725, Sixty-first Congress, third session, be printed, 3,000 for the use of the House of Representatives and 2,000 for the use of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 31856) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. TILLMAN as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 28406) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, Nos. 48, 76, and 82, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate, Mr. CLAPP, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. STONE.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 41) of the Senate was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 5,000 additional copies of Senate document 725, Sixty-first Congress, third session, be printed, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives and 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 32440. An act authorizing the Moline, East Moline & Watertown Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the south branch of the Mississippi River from a point in the village of Watertown, Rock Island County, Ill., to the island known as Campbells Island;

H. R. 24153. An act for the relief of John Marshall;

H. R. 23015. An act to protect the dignity and honor of the uniform of the United States;

H. R. 10430. An act to authorize the establishment of a marine biological station on the Gulf coast of the State of Florida;

H. R. 26606. An act for the relief of Charles A. Caswell; and

H. R. 5453. An act for the relief of the legal representatives of M. N. Swofford, deceased.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 28406) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912.

JOHN B. HENDERSON, JR.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the House sent a message to the Senate asking for the return of Senate joint resolution 145. It is on the Speaker's table, and I ask that it be taken from the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House from the Speaker's table S. J. Res. 145, providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur March 1, 1911, in the Board of Regents for the Smithsonian Institution of a class other than Members of Congress.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, in line 8, the word "Virginia" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the city of Washington," so that the resolution will read as follows:

"Resolved, That the vacancy in the Board of Regents for the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress, which will occur on March 1, 1911, by the resignation of Hon. John B. Henderson, to take effect on that day, be filled by the appointment of John B. Henderson, jr., of the city of Washington."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following resolution (H. Res. 1000), which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and hereby is, directed to cancel his signature to the enrolled joint resolution of the Senate (S. J. Res. 145), a joint resolution providing for the filling of the vacancy which will occur on March 1, 1911, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress, and that the Clerk of the House be directed to return the same to the Senate and request the Senate to reenroll the said resolution.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, that is necessary in order to straighten out the parliamentary tangle.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the words be added "as amended."

Mr. DALZELL. Very well, I will offer that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 28, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting schedules of papers and documents not needed for public business (H. Doc. No. 1411) was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Michigan, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate (S. J. Res. 82) directing that a portion of square No.

857 in the city of Washington, D. C., be reserved for use as an avenue and improved, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2258), which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PRINCE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. J. Res. 294) filling vacancies on the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2259), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 7574) for the relief of John M. Bonine, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2260); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 7648) for the relief of Charles J. Smith, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2261); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. KITCHIN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 1031) for the relief of Jaji Bin Ydris, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2262); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. TILSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 4023) for the relief of Arthur G. Fisk, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2263); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 9270) for the relief of Frank W. Hutchins, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2264), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 9954) for the relief of Lincoln C. Andrews, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2265), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 10591) to grant certain lands to the city of Trinidad, Colo., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2266), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 32956) extending the general public-land laws over the lands of the former Fort Laramie Post and wood and timber reserve; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. WATKINS: A bill (H. R. 32958) to carry into effect the provisions of the act of Congress forming the Public Health Service by providing penalties for the pollution of the navigable streams and lakes of the United States; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. PRINCE: A resolution (H. Res. 999) to pay Nannie E. Williams and others salary and burial expenses of John W. Williams; to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. ANDREWS: A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 295) approving the constitution formed by the constitutional convention of the Territory of New Mexico; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. REEDER: A memorial of the Legislature of Kansas protesting against the discontinuance of United States pension agencies; to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred, as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON: A bill (H. R. 32959) granting an increase of pension to Joseph A. Beach; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 32960) granting an increase of pension to Elisha L. Larowe; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ANDREWS: A bill (H. R. 32961) granting an increase of pension to Eveline H. Crichton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURLEIGH: A bill (H. R. 32962) granting an increase of pension to John J. Carter; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 32963) granting an increase of pension to Helen E. Sturtevant; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DICKINSON: A bill (H. R. 32964) granting a pension to Roseannah Martin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 32965) granting an increase of pension to J. D. Adkins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 32966) granting an increase of pension to C. Milstead; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SPARKMAN: A bill (H. R. 32967) granting an increase of pension to John Walker; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 32968) granting an increase of pension to Sarah N. Raulerson; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 32969) granting an increase of pension to John Bryant; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1911.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock and 50 minutes a. m.
Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, February 27.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If the reading of the Journal should be dispensed with, would that comply with the unanimous-consent agreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. KEAN. Then I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I object, simply for the reason that I want an opportunity for all Senators to be present, and some may not now be here.

Mr. KEAN. I withdraw my request, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn. The Secretary will continue the reading of the Journal.

The reading of the Journal was resumed.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin intend to object? The Chair was about to state the request of the Senator from Arkansas, but if the Senator from Wisconsin intends to object the Chair will not state it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not intend to object, Mr. President, if I am certain of having a parliamentary question settled to my satisfaction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his parliamentary question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It occurs to me, Mr. President, that a unanimous-consent agreement to dispense with the reading of the minutes of the previous meeting changes a unanimous-consent agreement which provided that a vote should be taken after the Journal had been read. If that is true, it seems to me it ought not to be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it would not change the agreement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If there is any doubt about it, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests that if the reading of the Journal be dispensed with some action will have been taken before the vote is had on the joint resolution. That is all. The Chair thinks to dispense with the further reading of the Journal would not change the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If there is any doubt about that the easiest and quickest way is to object, and also for the reasons stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana objects. The Secretary will continue the reading of the Journal.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Journal as read will stand approved.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the regular order, Mr. President.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 134) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the joint resolution, which, without objection, the Secretary will again report.

Mr. NELSON. There is an amendment printed in the joint resolution. I do not think I have offered it. I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution as it will be voted upon.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

"When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election, as the legislature may direct.

"This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BACON. I desire to make an inquiry as to the parliamentary situation. As I understand, the joint resolution has not been passed from the Committee of the Whole into the Senate——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No.

Mr. BACON. And the agreement to vote imports that the Senate shall take up the joint resolution in the situation in which it is found and proceed to its conclusion without debate. I do not understand that it dispenses with any of the regular parliamentary procedure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair's understanding differs from that of the Senator from Georgia. The Chair's understanding is that the vote shall at once be taken upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. I will state that the object I have is this: According to the regular parliamentary procedure the joint resolution, resting as it now does in the committee, would be, by the usual formula of the questions, transferred to the Senate, and when it reaches the Senate the question would be upon the adoption of amendments which had been agreed to in Committee of the Whole. It is with that view, desiring myself to offer an amendment, that I make the inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that the question now is on the passage of the joint resolution in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement; that all the prior actions, through committee, and so forth, are assumed to have been taken, and the question now is upon the passage.

Mr. BACON. Of course I would not at this stage endeavor to take issue with the Chair on the subject. I just desire to say that I should not like for it to be adopted as a precedent without dissent, because I do not think it is in accordance with the practice of the Senate in that regard. I think that under no interpretation heretofore has it ever been recognized that a matter pending in the Committee of the Whole could be voted upon as it can be in the House—the rule in the House, I know, is that way, but it is a very different rule and a very different practice here.

I want to say that I am not in any manner going to trespass upon the ruling of the Chair, but I wanted to say that my purpose was to offer this amendment, and I am going to ask unanimous consent that I may offer it. I understand there is an amendment of a grammatical character which the Senator from Idaho will want to ask to have made, and possibly, by unanimous consent, we might be allowed to vote upon this as a part of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that any such request would be a modification of the unanimous-consent agreement——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Which the Senate has invariably refused to do. The Chair thinks it can not be done. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BACON. There undoubtedly can be no modification of a unanimous-consent agreement so far as to displace the order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that the order is that the vote shall be at once taken without debate, and that if debate were now permitted it would be a modification of the order.

Mr. BACON. I want to say for myself that at the time the consent was given, I supposed it was the usual consent which is always with us to vote upon the bill and amendments then offered, or upon the joint resolution, as it may be, and the amendments.

I will say, in brief, that the amendment I wanted to offer is simply this: After the words—

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof—

Add:

Provided, That the Congress shall have power to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding such elections in any State the legislature of which fails or refuses to prescribe such times, places, and manner.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when Mr. FRAZIER'S name was called). The Senator from Tennessee is unavoidably absent on account of a death in his family. If he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. BACON (when Mr. TERRELL'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. TERRELL] is detained from the Chamber necessarily by personal illness. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—54.

Bailey	Clarke, Ark.	La Follette	Smith, Md.
Beveridge	Culberson	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Cullom	Martin	Smith, S.C.
Bourne	Cummins	Nelson	Stephenson
Bradley	Curtis	Newlands	Stone
Briggs	Davis	Nixon	Sutherland
Bristow	Dixon	Overman	Swanson
Brown	du Pont	Owen	Taylor
Burkett	Frye	Paynter	Thornton
Burton	Gamble	Perkins	Warner
Carter	Gore	Piles	Watson
Chamberlain	Gronna	Rayner	Young
Clapp	Guggenheim	Shively
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Simmons

NAYS—33.

Bacon	Dillingham	Lodge	Scott
Bankhead	Fletcher	Lorimer	Smoot
Brandegee	Flint	Money	Taliaferro
Bulkeley	Foster	Oliver	Tillman
Burnham	Gallinger	Page	Warren
Burrows	Hale	Penrose	Wetmore
Crane	Heyburn	Percy
Depew	Johnston	Richardson
Dick	Kean	Root

NOT VOTING—4.

Aldrich	Crawford	Frazier	Terrell

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon this question the yeas are 54, the nays are 33. Two-thirds not having voted therefor, the nays have it and the joint resolution is not passed.

Mr. CRAWFORD subsequently said: Mr. President, I rise to a matter of personal privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As the Senate well knows, I left here this morning at quite a late hour. I went to my apartment and I did my very best to reach here in time to vote on the special order this morning, but was unable to get a car. I did not reach here until about two minutes after the roll call was closed.

I desire to state that had I been present I would have voted for the joint resolution, but I was unavoidably absent on account of what I have said. I understand that my vote would not have saved the joint resolution, which I very much regret.

CONVEYANCE OF MAIL MATTER BY PRIVATE EXPRESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, stating, in response to a resolution of the 17th instant, that there have not been for many years, nor are there now, frequent, continuous, and systematic violations of section 181 of the Criminal Code of the United States, effective January 1, 1910, etc. (S. Doc. No. 843), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

LAWRENCE M. SIZER.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 27th ultimo, copies of all papers, charges, etc., in the matter of the dismissal from the service of Lawrence M. Sizer, formerly a clerk in the post office at Seattle, Wash. (S. Doc. No. 845), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

THE IRON AND STEEL INDUSTRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an estimate of appropriation for inclusion in the sundry civil appropriation bill to complete the investigation and compilation of the report relative to the conditions of employment prevailing in the iron and steel industry of the United States, etc. (S. Doc. No. 844), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the credentials of JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Alabama a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1913, which were read and ordered to be filed.

Mr. FLETCHER presented the credentials of NATHAN P. BRYAN, appointed by the governor of the State of Florida a Senator from that State from the 3d day of March, 1911, until the next meeting of the Legislature of Florida, which were read and ordered to be filed.

Mr. MARTIN presented the credentials of CLAUDE AUGUSTUS SWANSON, appointed by the governor of the State of Virginia a Senator from that State from the 3d day of March, 1911, until the next meeting of the Legislature of Virginia, which were read and ordered to be filed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 10457) to amend section 6 of the currency act of March 14, 1900, as amended by the act approved March 4, 1907.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 145) providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur on March 1, 1911, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 30292. An act to change the name of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service to the Public Health Service, to increase the pay of officers of said service, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 290. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a competent person to investigate the manufacture of white phosphorus matches and report to the next session of Congress.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to a resolution authorizing the Speaker of the House to cancel his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 145) providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur on March 1, 1911, in the Board of Regents in the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress, and that the Clerk of the House be directed to return the joint resolution to the Senate and request the Senate to reenroll the joint resolution as amended.

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 145) providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur March 1, 1911, in the Board of Regents in the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress, which was, in line 8, to strike out "Virginia" and insert "the city of Washington."

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented resolutions adopted at the second annual convention of the Jewish Community of New York City, N. Y., favoring the ratification of a new treaty between the United States and Russia, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Citizens' Association of Takoma Park, D. C., praying for the adoption of a system of universal transfers on the railroads in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I present a concurrent resolution passed by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, ratifying the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 3.

Concurrent resolution ratifying the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America.

Whereas both Houses of the Sixty-first Congress of the United States of America at its first session, by a constitutional majority of two-thirds thereof, made the following proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States of America in the following words, to wit:

"A joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution, namely:

"'ARTICLE XVI. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration: '"

Therefore be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, That the said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America be, and the same is hereby, ratified by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado.

That certified copies of this preamble and joint resolution be forwarded by the governor of this State to the President of the United States, Secretary of State of the United States, to the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate, and to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives.

STEPHEN R. FITZGARRALD,
President of the Senate.
GEORGE MCLACHLAN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved this 20th day of February, A. D. 1911.

JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
Governor of the State of Colorado.

Filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Colorado on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1911, at 5.43 o'clock p. m. Recorded in book —, page —.

JAMES B. PEARCE, Secretary of State,
By THOMAS F. DILLON, Jr., Deputy.

STATE OF COLORADO,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Colorado, ss:

I, James B. Pearce, secretary of state of the State of Colorado, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete transcript of senate concurrent resolution No. 3, by Senator Garman, concurrent resolution ratifying the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America, which was filed in this office the 21st day of February, A. D. 1911, at 5.43 o'clock p. m., and admitted to record.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Colorado at the city of Denver this 23d day of February, A. D. 1911.

[SEAL.] JAMES B. PEARCE, Secretary of State,
By THOMAS F. DILLON, Jr., Deputy.

Mr. BURNHAM presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New Hampshire, praying that an investigation be made into certain existing conditions in the Territory of New Mexico before the ratification of the constitution thereof, which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. KEAN presented petitions of Lincoln Post, of Newark; of John M. Wheeler Post, of Montclair; of Uzal Dodd Post, No. 12, of Orange; and of Major Dandy Post, No. 143, of Perth Amboy, all of the Department of New Jersey, Grand Army of the Republic, in the State of New Jersey, praying for the passage of the so-called old-age pension bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of H. B. Cornwall, of Princeton, N. J., praying for the ratification of the proposed reciprocal agreement between the United States and Canada, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Angle Manufacturing Co., of New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against any change being made in the rate of postage on periodicals and magazines, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Hackensack, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. CARTER. I present a joint memorial adopted by the Twelfth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 4.

Petition to Congress to enact such legislation as will be necessary for the establishment of pleasure grounds on the irrigation districts now laid out, and also naming Fort Shaw Military Post as one of said parks.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress of the United States assembled:

The Great West Country Life Commission, with headquarters at Spokane, Wash., a branch of the organization instituted recently by the executive department of the Government of the United States with a view of inaugurating a movement for the improvement of country-life conditions, has for its object the removal of unrest among the farmers and their families on account of their isolation from urban enjoyment, and especially has for its object the improvement of rural conditions so as to add to the attraction of farm life, and in furtherance of this purpose has formulated a plan for the establishment of pleasure grounds to be known as the Country Life Commission grounds, on which shall be erected halls, schoolhouses with suitable athletic fields, picnic grounds, and such like auxiliaries, thus affording means for education and amusements such as are furnished through the grange hall, harvest feast, and picnics of the Order of the Patrons of Husbandry, the grounds thus to be dedicated to embrace an area of from 10 to 20 acres, as occasion may demand.

The State of Montana, desirous of increasing the fascinations of farm life, gives its unqualified indorsement to this movement, and therefore

Resolved, That we, the Twelfth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the senate and house concurring, do hereby petition the Congress of the United States for the passage of legislation whereby supervising engineers of the several reclamation projects within this State shall be empowered to lay out such grounds for pleasure parks—of from 10 to 20 acres in every 20,000 acres of reclaimed land—and that the title to such parks so established shall be conveyed to a board of trustees to be appointed by the governor of the State, the title so vested to be held in trust.

And we further petition that that portion of the old military post of Fort Shaw, abandoned for garrison and Indian school purposes and now unused, embracing about 60 acres of land, and described as follows:

Lots 11 and 12, section 2; and that portion of the north one-half northeast one-fourth section 11, township 20, north of range 2 west, lying north of the Great Northern Sun River line right of way, the north one-half northeast one-fourth of section 11 being divided east and west by the Great Northern Sun River line right of way, be constituted a pleasure park for the reclamation districts known as the Fort Shaw unit of the Sun River reclamation project.

We do the more readily request the dedication of the Fort Shaw Military Post grounds for pleasure-park purposes as the buildings thereon are adobe and are not in condition to be moved, and the ground on which the buildings stand is valueless for agricultural purposes and the territory adjacent to the post is thickly peopled.

Resolved further, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state to the honorable Secretary of the Interior and our Senators and Representative in Congress, with the request that they use every effort within their power to secure the enactment of such legislation as is needful to effectuate the purposes herein indicated.

W. R. ALLEN, President of the Senate.
W. W. MCDOWELL, Speaker of the House.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Montana, ss:

I, A. N. Yoder, secretary of state of the State of Montana, do hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of Senate joint memorial No. 4, petitioning Congress to enact such legislation as will be necessary for the establishment of pleasure grounds on the irrigation districts now laid out, and also naming Fort Shaw Military Post as one of said parks, enacted by the twelfth session of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, and approved by Edwin L. Norris, governor of said State, on the 17th day of February, 1911.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of said State.

Done at the city of Helena, the capital of said State, this 17th day of February, A. D. 1911.

[SEAL.] A. N. YODER, Secretary of State.

Mr. NIXON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Reno, Nev., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called parcels-post bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the Federation of Citizens' Associations of Washington, D. C., favoring continuation of the present public school system, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the International Pulp and Paper Mill Workers' Unions of Fort Edward, N. Y., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal agreement between the United States and Canada, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. YOUNG. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the secretary of the Commercial Club of Des Moines, Iowa, relative to the consolidation of the pension agencies. I ask that the telegram lie on the table and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DES MOINES, IOWA, February 27, 1911.

HON. LAFAYETTE YOUNG,
Washington, D. C.:

If pension offices are to be reduced in number by the consolidation of offices, why not favor the offices located in Government-owned properties, with adequate facilities for their accommodation? In Des Moines the Government owns a Federal building worth, with grounds, three-quarters of a million, used exclusively for Federal offices and courts; also another building, worth $500,000, exclusive of real estate, used exclusively for post office. In the first building is the pension office, using half of the second floor. The entire first floor, of over 10,000 square feet, is not now in use and is available for pension office and would afford more than twice the room now occupied, leaving ample room for courts, custom, and other Federal offices and for their extension for the next 50 years.

COMMERCIAL CLUB,
GEIS BOTSFORD, Secretary.

Mr. BURTON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to further increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ROOT presented petitions of sundry labor organizations of Albany, Amsterdam, Auburn, Buffalo, Batavia, Binghamton, Bridgehampton, Brooklyn, Cornwall, Elmira, Glens Falls, Geneva, Hudson, Herkimer, Ithaca, Kingston, Lake Placid, Lockport, Lestershire, Montgomery, Minaville, Manlius, New York City, Newburgh, New Rochelle, Ogdensburg, Poughkeepsie, Perry, Rochester, Rifton, Syracuse, Union Course, Utica, Waverly, Yonkers, and Valley Stream, all in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the North Side Board of Trade, of New York City, N. Y., praying for the extension of the pneumatic-tube system into the Borough of the Bronx, New York City, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SCOTT presented a petition of the congregation of the Baptist Church of Grafton, W. Va., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the interstate transmission of race-gambling bets, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Okonoko, W. Va., remonstrating against any increase being made in the rate of postage on periodicals and magazines, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 22270) for the relief of Amos M. Barbin, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1261) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 30281) to provide for the entry under bond of exhibits of arts, sciences, and industries, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1262) thereon.

Mr. OWEN. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and on my own behalf, I submit the following report to accompany the bill (H. R. 31539) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes. The attention of the Senate is called to the amendment proposed by me on the 25th instant relative to the rate of postage on periodicals and magazines. I move that the report be printed as Part 2, Senate Report No. 1242, submitted by me a few days ago.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 32436) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1263) thereon.

DUTY ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Finance, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 28626) to amend the internal-revenue laws relating to distilled spirits, and for other purposes, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:
